Minutemen drop third straight, 13–10 to JMU

By Mike Corey
Collegian Staff

HARRISONBURG, Va. — On Saturday night, under the lights of Bridgeforth Stadium, the Massachusetts football team was unable to pick up its first win of the season, as it fell 13–10 to the Dukes of James Madison University.

In a contest which saw limited scoring, the Minutemen were in it for the entire game and only trailed 13–7 at half- time. However, the extent of the second–half scoring would be only a 24–yard field goal by UMass' Andy Maclay with 2:23 left in the third quarter, cutting the lead to three where it would stand, as UMass (0–3) suffered its third loss in as many games.

"You just can't turn the ball over," Massachusetts coach Mike Hodges said. "And you've got to take advantage of it when you get an opportunity. We have to learn to make the plays when we have to make them."

UMass wasn't able to get anything going offensively and many series resulted in three plays and out deep in their own territory. Field position was not on UMass' side as they only started with the ball once in JMU territory.

"The second half was a lot of frustration," Hodges said. "We needed to drive the football, we had the opportunities and we didn't do it."

After a UMass penalty on the opening kickoff, JMU's freshman return man, Delvin Joyce, would take the second UMass offering 72 yards down to the 25–yard line. However, UMass would hold the Dukes to a field goal attempt, which they missed.

The opening possession for the Minutemen wasn't much better. Freshman running back Marcel Shipp fumbled a second down carry, and JMU would recover at the UMass 33–yard line. Six plays and 3:02 later, freshman Anthony Moore took the pitch 14 yards to the right side of the endzone for a score and an early 7–0 JMU lead.

In the second quarter, the skies opened up and a driving rainstorm welcomed the Minutemen to Virginia, just like it did last week in Orono, Maine. UMass was unaffected though, and with 8:03 in the second started a drive from their own 3–yard line and marched down field into JMU territory.

After a third down conversion at the JMU 46 was unsuccessful UMass had to punt. However, this time Joyce fumbled the return at the 13–yard line, where it was recovered by Chris Price, which set up UMass' only touchdown.

After the Price fumble recovery, on the third play of the series, junior fullback Jim Pizano took the pitch four yards into the endzone for a score with 2:57 left before the half, tying the game at 7–7.

The final JMU drive of the half began with the Minutemen being flagged for two penalties, the first on a controversial roughing the passer call, and then an offsides penalty, giving the Dukes 20 free yards.

Then after a pair of runs by Joyce, the Dukes entered UMass territory at the 40–yard line with less than a minute to go in the half. Two plays later, sophomore quarterback Greg Maddox would find wide receiver Earnest Payton for a 35–yard touchdown pass.

Ben Scott, who was on coverage for the Minutemen on the play, slipped on the wet turf and Payton walked in from the 10–yard line, Numbers, numbers, numbers — used so much in the sports business, but often do not pile up to more than a hill of beans. However, these two sets of numbers encapsulate the history between Colorado coach Austin Daniels and Massachusetts coach Jim Rudy.

After Saturday afternoon's 1–0 double overtime win for the No. 12 Massachusetts women's soccer team over the Buffaloes at Totman Field, those two sets of numbers signify the aggregate time of the last three matches between Daniels' and Rudy's teams (349:55), and the aggregate score of said matches (3–1, in favor of UMass).

It's safe to say the next time the two coaches face off, they better pack a big lunch, a change of clothes, a toothbrush and send a note to their parents, because they might check out any time they like, but they may never leave.

Dating back to 1995, and Daniels' coaching days at the University of Hartford, the Minutewomen have a 2–0–1 record against the coach of the newly–instated Colorado program.

After a 0–0 double OT draw at Hartford in 1995, with current Buffalo goalkeeper Sloane Cox in net, and a 2–1 UMass double OT win in the '96 NCAAs on a goal with a second remaining by now–assistant coach Rachel Leduc, double OT–itis continued with Daniels' new squad, with Rudy again getting the best of his adversary and friend.

The recent best came from freshman forward Kara Green, who continued her flying start by putting the hard–fought match away at the 109:56 mark, on a physically–demanding goal that mirrored the style of the entire match.

Junior forward Sophie Lecot made a run down the right flank, sending in a low cross that saw sophomore forward

Last five minutes count for UM women's soccer

By Kathleen Ralls
Collegian Staff

There's something to be said about the five–minute rule. You've got the prime seat of the party — maybe it's the recliner or maybe it's a spot on the end of the couch next to the coffee table where you can put your drink. In any case, you really have to go to the bathroom and subsequently must declare "five minutes." If you don't, it's like watching the little kids with gloves charge to the front seats in the ninth at a blowout Red Sox game.

There is another kind of five–minutes pertaining to sports. No matter the level, or the game, as soon as the clock ticks 5:00, both teams are off and running like they did the first five minutes of the game (unless it's the NBA). If the game is not on the line, coaches and spectators encourage their players to "finish up strong." It's understandable that an athlete can't give "110 percent" every minute of the game unless the game was just five minutes, and even then...

Saturday afternoon's game pitting the No. 12 Massachusetts women's soccer team, and a 2–4 Colorado team ran into double overtime. While both teams slashed their way down the field in fury, Massachusetts' freshman Kara Green scored at the 109:56 mark for the 1–0 game– winner.

Just five minutes prior to the end of regulation, both teams hurled themselves into a furious game where goalies were ruthlessly hunted by hauling attackers, exercising their right to miraculously score a game–ending goal, with goaltenders making fabulous saves regardless. There were sliding saves executed about every 48 seconds to stop charging forwards, and while all this sounds like a great afternoon, there is a negative side.

There were more corner kicks and throw–ins from the sidelines, which provided a choppy atmosphere. The normally level–headed defenders were just clearing the ball in hopes of a long goal, instead of showing off skills they might have otherwise.

Across the field there seemed personal battles, though sportsmanship was maintained for the most part. A yellow card was eventually distributed to maintain order in the unruly Totman Field. Basically, the game was less flowing and more gritty, which in most cases can end in a glorious goal for one team.

By then, it doesn't matter whether it's pretty or not.

This five–minute drill also affects the fans as well. No longer are they sitting in idle chat with one eye on the game and the other eye on their kids (except for those in the upper right corner of the bleachers). Their eyes are transfixed on the ball, and whomever's feet are guiding it to the promised land. A bad call from a ref might

UM's Shipp filling some big shoes

By Corey Peter Goodman
Collegian Staff

HARRISONBURG, Va. — Marcel Shipp was tired and beaten.

And when he stepped out of the University of Massachusetts football locker room Saturday night after a devastating 13–10 loss to the James Madison Dukes in Harrisonburg, Va., the boos and hisses from the thousands of JMU faithful — directed toward the Minuteman marching band — put salt in his already open wounds.

"It hurts, you know. But we'll be alright," he said, wincing in pain from undoubtedly a number of areas on his body. "We just have to come back again next week. That's all."

For Shipp, a young, highly–touted tailback, next week may not bring better days. As a true freshman, Shipp was given the opportunity this season to see playing time while starting tailback, Matt Jordan, was recovering from a hamstring injury. Jordan has been healing steadily, and may be ready to go next week at home against Rhode Island. Shipp knows he'll have to roll with the punches.

"I respect Matt a lot," he said. "I'll do whatever the coaches ask me to do. I just want to play a role on this team."

It's likely that Shipp will play a huge role in the games and years to come.

A talented product of Passaic Tech High School in Paterson, N.J., Shipp racked up over 3,200 yards and 42 touchdowns in high school. With impressive numbers and obvious ability, recruiters from Clemson, Memphis State and a hoard of other division one schools came calling. But Shipp ended up wearing the maroon and white in Amherst.

"It [UMass] felt like home to me," he said. "When I visited, I knew it's where I wanted to play."

In the second game of the season against Maine, Shipp saw his first extended action. Carrying the ball 11 times for 78 yards, Shipp looked like Massachusetts coach Mike Hodges' best kept secret. Though a bit undersized at 5–foot– 7 and 195 pounds, Shipp, at times, challenged linebackers and carried defensive linemen the extra two or three yards to the first down sticks. When he wasn't pretending to be a fullback, Shipp was bursting through holes with incredible speed.

One of those big gains went for the Minutemen's only touchdown last week, a 20–yard scamper in the second quarter.

In the losing effort, Shipp impressed the coaching staff so much that they bumped him up on the depth chart just ahead of then–backup tailback, junior Jim Pizano.

"Jim is a guy I really look up to," he said. "He always there for me, picking me up when I'm down, and teaching me all about our plays."

Saturday at James Madison, Shipp earned the starting nod.

"I was a little nervous at the start of the game, but it got easier," he said.

Shipp was the driving force in UMass' offensive scheme. He rushed for 98 yards on 16 carries. This included a handful of six, seven and eight–yard gains surrounded by a 35–yard burst in the third quarter that set up a Minuteman field goal.

"It was a great opportunity for me," he said. "I'll take it from here."

Shipp says his relationship with Hodges has inspired him on the field.

"He's a great man, and he's a great coach," he said. "Coach has taught

Some people just have "it". That extra little something, that lets them perform at their best when it's needed the most. "It" is the ability to pull it out at crunchtime, to come through when frustration is at its peak, and win it for the team.

Massachusetts mens' soccer forward Mike Butler appears to have "it."

A week ago Saturday, in a sudden death overtime game against Maine, Butler scored the game–winning goal with just six seconds left on the clock. This past weekend he managed to do it again in a hotly contested game against No. 9 Boston University.

With the score notched at 1–1, and just 4:31 left to go in sudden death overtime, Butler scored with a 12–yarder over BU goalie Bryan Murphy. He was assisted on the play by junior midfielder Jake Brodsky. The win was the third in a row for the Minutemen, and one that now has their spirits riding high.

Massachusetts	2

"With BU, it's always a war," coach Sam Koch said. "To be honest, I think that we look forward to this game more than they do."

The game was a very physical one, with a lot of fouls called, and a yellow card handed out to Terrier midfielder Chris Bone, when he knocked over Brodsky during the second half. The intensity and competitiveness was also evident in the amount of trash talking that occurred on the field.

"It's always a tough, physical match with them," Koch said. "It's always a great head to head competition. [BU] wanted it today, they are a good team, and they battled with us. It's a physical game."

"They are a much bigger team," Butler said. "They were pushing us around and putting the ball in the air. But we just used quick touches to get around them, and that's what made the difference, plus the team worked very well together today."

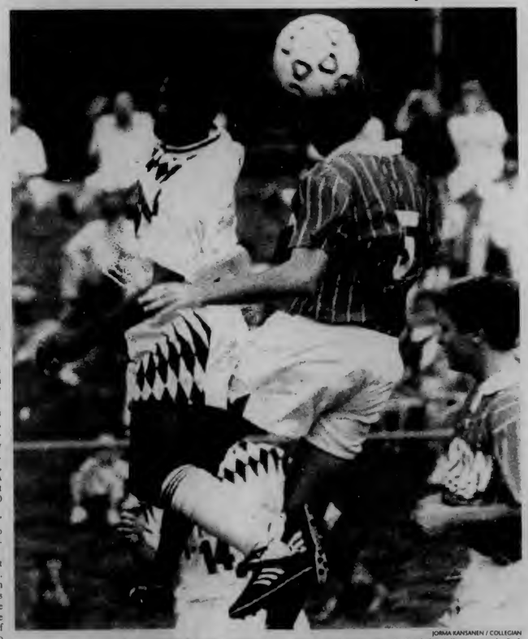
UMass scored first in the game, when junior Brad Kurowski scored at the 19:43 mark, from five yards out. He was assisted by freshman Seth Lilburn.

The first half seemed to belong to the Minutemen, as they kept BU scoreless. But UMass looked a little shaky in the second, and had trouble pulling things together. The Terriers dominated the field, but were still only able to score once, with a six–yarder from Nick Bone. Massachusetts' defense seemed to be improving and tightening down.

Sophomore keeper Todd Fowler has been hot as of late. He had six saves in Saturday's game, to Murphy's four.

"As a team we played very defensively," Butler said. "We played very compact and together as a whole team. We basically accomplished a lot of the things that we worked on in practice. I can't stress enough how much we did all the little things."

UMass was outshot by Boston University 26–17, and took no corner kicks to the Terriers six.



There is a little concern among the team that this game was their fourth overtime game in a row, although it was also their third consecutive overtime win.

"We are really disappointed with our finishing, that we haven't been able to get it done in regulation," Koch said.

With the number of overtime games they have found themselves in, fatigue has very much become a factor for the Minutemen, especially with their upcoming schedule. Tomorrow they will play Hartford, a team that went to the NCAA Tournament last season. After that they will begin their Atlantic 10 play.

"We train for overtime in practice," Butler said. "But we are trying to win it closer and closer to regulation time."

The win over BU was one that UMass was not expected to take. Not only will it probably earn them national ranking, but the team's spirits are high as well, and the energy should carry them to some extent over the next couple of games. The team is beginning to gain momentum, and their record now stands at 4–0–1.

Kohl sees elections as beneficial to CDU

BONN, Germany — Brushing off a second–place finish and a surge of support for a far–right party, Chancellor Helmut Kohl said yesterday that the Hamburg election was a good omen for his party in next year's national elections.

The city–state's ruling Social Democrats fell sharply in Sunday's vote, possibly setting back their campaign to wrest control of the federal government from Kohl in September 1998 elections. Kohl's Christian Democratic Union gained ground, though it remained in second place in Germany's second–largest city. In Sunday's vote, the Social Democrats fell from 40.4 percent of the vote in 1993 to 36.2 percent, its worst postwar showing in this northern port city, a traditional stronghold. The Christian Democrats increased their share from 25.1 percent to 30.7 percent. "I am very happy with the message the people of Hamburg have given me," Kohl told a news conference in Bonn. He said his party's gains were a "good signal" prior to a series of regional votes and the general election next year.

Clinton, Gore claim contributions legal

NEW YORK — President Clinton declared yesterday that he and Vice President Al Gore "intended to be firmly within the letter of the law" when they sought donations in their 1996 re-election campaign.

"I believed then and I believe now that what we did was legal," Clinton told reporters in New York, where he was addressing the United Nations.

Meanwhile, former presidential aide Harold Ickes told Senate investigators he did not know whether Clinton actually made fund-raising calls from the White House, according to Senate officials familiar with a closed-door deposition.

Ickes, who was the top White House political staffer during the 1996 campaign, was recalled by investigators for a second sworn deposition. He has not been called to testify in public.

Ickes told attorneys for the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee that he did not coordinate with special interest groups on advertising campaigns and other expenditures. When these organizations make so-called independent expenditures, they are not permitted to coordinate with candidates or parties meant to benefit from the effort.

Board addresses student arrests

Beth McCarthy
Collegian Staff

Students living off–campus are a serious problem.

This statement led to the strong and extreme discussion at last night's Amherst Select Board meeting, which again went unresolved.

With 33 students being arrested on the weekend of Sept. 13 and 18 arrested this past weekend, with the low number probably due to the rain, Barry Del Castillo, Amherst town manager, considers this a definite problem.

However, the problem is compounded by the speed in which arrested students are bailed out, said Harry Brooks, former Selectman.

"They bail 'em out so fast they can go back to the party," said Brooks of a weekend night he spent observing the Amherst Police station.

Brooks said that students are in and out so fast that it no longer serves as a penalty and suggested that this problem be addressed to town judges and magistrates.

Perhaps bail should be witheld for a duration of at least a night or the magistrate not be so readily accesible, suggested Brooks.

Another angle to curb large and disruptive congregations of students was licensing the landlords was raised by Selectman, Hill Boss, who is one of the strongest advocates of resolving off–campus student misbehavior.

"Once we have the power to withhold licences for irresponsible landlords, then we can maybe do something," said Boss.

Rent control was also raised by Ken Mosakowski, County Commissioner, as a viable option.

Because of the lapse in rent control, "students are being exploited by crooked landlords and are being packed into small units," said Mosakowski.

He suggested that with rent control, students would be able to afford to spread out a little and as a result, the town won't have as large a problem.

Although all of these ideas were seriously considered, none were voted on.

This is too large a problem and the scope of a solution is too emense to be able to make any on–the–spot decisions, said Bryan Harvey, Chair of the Select Board.

Harvey said that before any decisions are made he would like to pass these suggestions by the Amherst Police as well as the Problem Solving Partnership to be sure that no laws are being violated and also to see if they have any solutions of their own.

Other issues addressed were licenses of local business and committee appointments including that of Karl Seppala, who was voted onto the Parking Commission.

Pow wow brings Native American community together

By India Joy Rose
Collegian Correspondent

Over the weekend, native people of various tribal nations, UMass students, members of the Amherst community and many observers from the Northeast region of the country joined together to participate in the annual University of Massachusetts Pow Wow.

The Pow Wow, which portrays many traditional ceremonies of the native people took place on the campus pond lawn.

Grand Entry was led by three senior dancers holding the American, Canadian and Vietnam P.O.W. flags.

Southern Rhode Island native, Donald Hopkins, of the Niantic Narragansett Nation, carried the American flag containing an image of a Native American in the center. Hopkins, a traditional dancer, explained the unique portrayal and said, "We come first and beyond all foreigners, we are the caretakers of this land."

Hopkins also requested that an untitled poem written by a "dear friend" of his, Luke Marten be read to the Amherst community and UMass students. Hopkins, who holds the poem close to his heart, felt that Marten's poem has a powerful theme that should be communicated to everyone.

Following the senior dancers, men, women and children of all ages dressed in handmade regalia displaying an array of brilliant colors.

Regalia is the clothing worn by the native people when they participate in dances and songs. The dancers, who are led by two head dancers: a male and a female, may dance to their own visions or dance for healing. Each dance and song represents either the tribal nation or the individual.

There were several individual displays that were sensational. However, a performance exhibited by a seven–year–old, Adam Genia, electrified the crowd.

Genia performed a five minute Fancy Hoop Dance with dazzling skill and coordination. With eight hoops, he danced wrapping them around his body to the rhythmical beats of the drums and song.

Justin Beatty, a junior art and theater major at UMass, played a large role in orchestrating the Pow Wow. Beatty represents the Nation of Anishinabe and is also an active member in the Native American Student Association (NASA) on campus.

When questioned about how he felt about the turn out, he responded, "It's not so much about the turn out, but about the Native people getting together." Beatty was a dancer and also one of the emcee's at the ceremony.

On the outskirts of the central tent, there were various venders and booths. The venders sold traditional native foods such as Indian tacos and venison sausages. Many of the booths sold beads, beadwork items, silver, jewelry and books written by Native American authors.

One such author, Mildred Noble, author of Sweet Lives, was honored with a dance and song. The extensive procession around the interior of the main tent consisted of dancers, singers, relatives and friends.

Richard Fournier, a Native American from Manchester, NH, had a booth in which he sold books, rattles that were made of deer toe, chestnut shells, animal vertebrae and handmade jewelry.

According to Fournier, Pow Wows are a time for Native Americans to join together and celebrate their culture. Some like Fournier travel every other weekend from New England to participate in Pow Wows.

Attending a Pow Wow gives Native Americans the chance "to portray ourselves as we really are, and to learn about our culture," he said.

ARLINGTON, Va. — Marv Albert called a woman a "bad girl" and severely bit her in a hotel room for not bringing another man into bed with them, a prosecutor told jurors today as the sportscaster's sodomy trial began.

Albert is accused of biting the woman on the back and forcing her to perform oral sex. He pleaded innocent today, just before jury selection began, to charges of forcible sodomy and assault and battery that, if he is convicted, could bring him a life sentence. Library Celebration of Latino Heritage

Albertina Fernandes
Collegian Correspondent

As music filled the W.E.B. Du Bois Library's main floor for the first time, history was being made as well.

Beginning the open house for Latino Heritage Week was a program focusing on "Latinos and the Library." The emphasis was to attract more Latinos to utilize the library's Latin–American collection.

Dr. Peter Stern and Lori Mestre, co–coordinators of "Latino Heritage Week" attributed this event to Pauline P. Collins, the retired Latin American studies librarian, who was responsible for building the Latin America collection here at the University of Massachusetts Amherst.

Collins participated in finding books that professors and students would be interested in and brought them to the now re–named Du Bois Library. She became almost electively responsible for making sure that books that were essential to the understanding of Latinos were not cut off of the library collections.

"The W.E.B. Du Bois Library holds the largest collection of Latin America books in a public library in the Northeast, third in New England behind only Harvard and Yale," Stern said. "The books included in their collections are Spanish and Portuguese language and literature, women's studies, anthropology, education, economics and political science."

The keynote speaker of the evening, Sonia Nieto, gave a speech on "Latinos and Libraries: Forging Links why it is important? and who benefits?" She also touched upon why Latinos need to be more user–friendly with the library.

Nieto's speech regarded why it is important for the Latino community to adhere to this call for more involvement with libraries which stemmed from her childhood experiences w. The selections of books that she remembered of Latino-Americans were not anything she could identify with. For instance, she could not relate with the characters in the books she read throughout her young adult life because they did not reflect her world.

"All children have the right to see themselves, their family, community in the books they read," Nieto said.

"How can libraries become more welcoming?" she asked. Nieto proposed activities, such as this library celebration, to prepare library staff and become more aware of cultural and linguistic differences. This would, in some ways, help rectify the current status of the library. Nieto urged people not to see the library as an intimidating structure, but as a place with a wealth of useful information. She encourages students, staff and anyone else interested in using the libraries to do so.

place at the hands of that man, and it took place and was accomplished by his physical domination of a 41-year-old woman," Trodden said.

The prosecutor said the two met in 1986 when the accuser was a telephone operator at the Miami Airport Hilton hotel "and the relationship took off rapidly. It was a sexual relationship from almost the very beginning."

Trodden acknowledged the couple had threesomes before, once in Los Angeles and once in Miami, the last occurring in 1990 or 1991. Because Albert's job prevented the couple from seeing each other for months at a time, Trodden said they engaged in lots of fantasy sex on the phone and Albert's end of the conversation generally centered "on participating in a threesome with another male." Black said the woman was lashing back at Albert because her life was unraveling. He said she had lost her job and was released from a stay in a mental hospital just six weeks before the alleged attack.

"She became unbalanced, vindictive and wanting to get revenge on Marv Albert," Black aid. "This is her revenge."

Black also said she "collects" celebrities and would "brag about the celebrities she has had relationships with, people like Peter Jennings" and sports figures.

Earlier in the day, a jury of seven women and five men was seated to hear the trial, assuring a judge and attorneys they could handle graphic testimony about violent sex. The trial is expected to last about a week.

The defense opening statement was to follow Trodden's. Perhaps opening a window into the defense strategy, Albert's lawyer Roy Black this morning asked about 20 potential jurors if any had ever seen the movie "Fatal Attraction." The film is about an obsessed woman who refused to let go of a failed love affair and stalked her ex-lover.

Opening arguments began after a closed hearing on how much of the accuser's sexual past would be admitted into evidence. The state has a rape shield law that requires defense lawyers to show how an accuser's sexual history is relevant.

Defense attorneys plan to argue that Albert had consensual sex with his accuser, now 42. Black also asked the panel members if they would have difficulty with testimony about sex.

"Would there be anyone uncomfortable to sit on a case involving a sexual activity, something you hadn't done before, involving biting or something like that?" he asked the panel.

No potential jurors said they would be uncomfortable, and none said they would be disturbed by hearing about sex acts they themselves would not do.

One woman, who had a book entitled "History of Christianity" with her in the courtroom, split with the other potential jurors on the question of whether they would think less of a person who watched adult movies. She indicated she would; she was not selected.

Trodden had asked potential jurors whether they had opinions on "a person's right to say what's going to happen to their body" and whether "just because there has been a relationship between two people that a member has automatically given the choice of what they're to do."

Correction

In yesterday's article on the Women of Color conference, Deirdre Almeida's name was misspelled. "DeeDee" is also Almeida's nickname, not Joyce White Deer Vincent's.

In Thursday's article entitled "Ombudsman receives vote of no confidence," Tom Taaffe, a graduate student of anthropology was quoted as being "threatened by my own department..." According to Taaffe, he was referring to the Ombudsman's office, not the anthropology department. The Collegian regrets these errors.

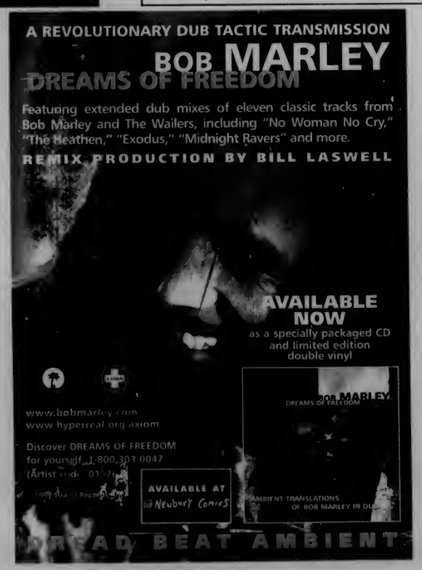
A Healthy Investment in Your Future

Health Care. Those two words have been the source of much discussion recently. Probably because we as a nation know the importance of investing in a healthy future.

So do millions of patients who choose chiropractic as their preferred source of health care. The chiropractic beliefs in fitness, nutrition, prevention, and natural maintenance make good sense.

Wellness, you see, is the normal state of being.

New York State government agrees. They have recently passed the Insurance Equality bill that mandates insurance coverage for chiropractic care.



For over 75 years, New York Chiropractic College has upheld a tradition of excellence in chiropractic higher education. Our combined traditions, old and new, have built the base from which the chiropractic doctors of the future are created.

GLBT lecture series opens

By Rachael Pepe
Collegian Staff

Fernando Chang-Muy, a law professor at the University of Pennsylvania, spoke on the cutting edge issue's of lesbian and gay adoption last Thursday as part of the Gay Lesbian Bi-sexual Transgender (GLBT) Study Lecture Series.

Chang-Muy addressed family law issues affecting straight and gay families who want to adopt or are in the process of adoption.

"Straight people take some of these things for granted," Chang-Muy said, "but we cannot."

Chang-Muy cited a Massachusetts law that prohibits openly gay or lesbian people from applying to become foster care parents, but said that lesbians and gays can apply for adoption of a child.

The problem, Chang-Muy said, is that gays and lesbians are forced to "hide" certain personal aspects of their lives from some adoption agencies in order to go through the process of adoption.

Chang-Muy spoke about three types of adoption: agency adoption, private placement and second parent adoption.

Agency adoption and private placement require a "home study," in which a social worker visits and studies the home of the individual who wants to adopt.

The social worker then decides if the home is fit for a child, Chang-Muy said, and the adoption process can then begin.

There must also be evidence of a strong support system of people who can chip in with the care of the child in case the parent becomes ill or some other emergency arises, Chang-Muy said.

He also shared his own personal experience of adopting a child with his partner of 16 years.

Chang-Muy stressed the importance of "doing your homework" and finding out what agencies are sensitive to lesbian and gay issues.

"Be careful and get advice," he said. "Make sure you know what to say to help you out."

According to Chang-Muy, he and his partner, Len, were the first gay male couple to adopt a child in the City of Philadelphia.

"It's a new experience," Chang-Muy added. "We love kids and it has enriched our lives."

Senate panel to investigate wrongs in penny-stock trade

By Marcy Gordon
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Senate investigators are delving into the slippery world of stock fraud, examining abuses in the penny-stock market estimated to rob ordinary investors of $6 billion a year. At the same time, the Securities and Exchange Commission and state securities regulators issued a "cold-calling alert" Monday, warning consumers to hang up on aggressive brokers selling investments over the telephone.

The long-running bull market has drawn multitudes of eager new investors but also has created more victims of rogue brokers' aggressive stock schemes and unauthorized trading on accounts, securities regulators say.

In May, regulators in 20 states began a crackdown against 14 brokerage firms accused of fraudulent sales practices. And the FBI has been working with securities regulators to investigate stocks of 19 small companies allegedly manipulated by organized crime. A Senate investigative subcommittee is looking into the problem and also is trying to put a human face on stock fraud, which often involves low-priced shares of high-risk stocks that are thinly traded. Besides summoning top regulators to testify at a hearing Monday, investigators are hearing firsthand from some small investors who allegedly were bilked.

Many victims of such fraud are elderly.

SEC Chairman Arthur Levitt Jr. is directing the agency's enforcement officials to help the Justice Department and local law enforcement authorities in prosecuting more stock fraud cases. "We have stepped up both our civil and criminal enforcement efforts — we are working with criminal (law enforcement) authorities as never before to lock up bad brokers and deter wrongdoers," Levitt said in testimony prepared for delivery at the hearing.

He said the SEC also is looking to close loopholes in the rules governing the penny-stock market and is focusing more attention on unscrupulous brokerage firms, not only individual brokers. The subcommittee investigation "will underscore for the American people the growing problem of fraud in the sale of small-company stocks, a truly pernicious undercurrent in ... our nation's robust financial markets," said Sen. Susan Collins, R-Maine, chairman of the Senate permanent subcommittee on investigations.

She cited regulators' estimates that investors are being defrauded of some $6 billion annually — three times the peak amount during the 1980s before enactment of the Penny Stock Reform Act of 1990.

That law resulted from an epidemic of penny-stock fraud during the last decade. Then as now, rogue brokers often use high-pressure sales tactics over the telephone and the Internet, pushing up stock prices, then dumping their own shares, sending prices abruptly and sharply lower.

Consumers can get a "cold-calling alert" brochure by phoning the SEC's toll-free information line at 1-800-SEC-0330. An on-line version is available on the SEC's Web site at www.sec.gov.

Pow Wow. The drums, which were used in every song and dance, were large and decorated with many different native styles. The sound of the drums filled the tent, as well as the center of campus.

According to Melanio Gonzalez, a representative of the Taino Tribe from Connecticut, drums hold a great symbolic value for Native Americans.

"The surface of the drum represents the womb of the earth. The drum represents the heartbeat, so you dance to the beat of the heart," Gonzalez said.

Despite a brief period of inclement weather on Saturday, the mood and spirit of the Pow Wow remained consistent through the weekend. The jovial, yet dignified manner of the participants created a distinctive aura that could be seen and felt. Nothing exemplified this more than the enthusiastic and animated behavior of the Native children.

As a senior woman dressed in regalia so eloquently said, "When I see the youth here today dancing, it represents hope for the future that our traditions will be carried on."

Seagram buys USA Network, Viacom out-bid

By Eric R. Quinones
Associated Press

NEW YORK —The drawn-out battle for control of USA Networks ended Monday with a deal for Universal Studios owner Seagram Co. to buy out partner Viacom Inc. for $1.7 billion.

The deal benefits Seagram by giving it sole control of USA Network and Sci-Fi Channel to distribute Universal's movies and television shows. It also helps Viacom's attempts to climb out from under a mountain of debt.

"The feeling was that each side would rather take control of its own destiny," said Universal chairman Frank Biondi, Viacom's former chief executive and a key figure in the companies' courtroom fight.

The agreement includes a clause that Viacom will not start a competing network to Sci-Fi Channel in the United States for an unspecified period of time, Biondi said. It also includes some programming licensing arrangements with Viacom's Paramount studios. Biondi said the popular Universal-produced shows "Hercules: The Legendary Journeys" and "Xena: Warrior Princess" will go to USA after their current syndication deals expire.

Jill Krutick, an entertainment analyst at Smith Barney, said Seagram paid a fair price given the networks' growth potential. The companies' dispute over their 50-50 stake in USA began in April 1996, when Seagram filed a lawsuit saying Viacom's ownership of competing networks such as MTV and VH-1 violated their agreement.

Viacom countersued, saying Seagram was trying to gain leverage to get all of USA at a cheap price. But four months ago, a Delaware judge agreed with Seagram and ordered both sides to renegotiate their partnership.

Viacom gained its USA stake through its 1994 acquisition of Paramount Communications. Seagram bought a one-third stake in USA in late 1981. The two companies' stakes increased to 50 percent each in 1987 when a third partner, Time Inc., sold out.

Viacom said it will use proceeds from the USA sale to help pay off its debt. The media conglomerate had amassed $10.7 billion in debt as of the second quarter, much of it from the 1994 purchases of Paramount and the Blockbuster video chain.

Praying at the altar of beauty

Perhaps it was a just punishment for going to this particular bar, which was styled after the beauty parlor that previously occupied the space. But I like this bar. I like the 1940s hair spray advertisements that hang above the top shelf, and I like the clunky green dryers that line the walls. And I especially like the manicurist, a former employee of the salon, who will do your nails while you sip a Cosmopolitan or a Rolling Rock. A bouncer proofed me that night, and I quickly realized that I had left my ID at home. So he asked me how old I was. "I'm 31." I said, almost apologetically.

focus on Women
Sara Eckel

"Wow," he said. "You're really well-preserved."

Now, I confess that for about half a second I was pleased with this response. Ever since I hit the latter half of my 20s, I have taken a secret delight in being carded. I may be angry at the world for judging the way a woman ages so harshly, but that doesn't mean I'm not slathering on the Clinique every morning. But then it hit me: well-preserved? Isn't that what you say about an octogenarian aunt — or a jar of pickles? Was I already at the point where I would have to be preserved? Where only through the miracle of modern science, through the systematic application of balms and elixirs, could I possibly look the way I do? And what, exactly, was I supposed to look like?

I've been hearing comments of this nature ever since I turned 30 (no one ever seemed surprised by my age when I was 29) and I have always been shallow and vain enough to welcome them. But this time, I realized what a bite they have. Because when people compliment us for looking young, they are essentially saying that the age we are is unacceptable. That we are living on borrowed time. And that we should thank God for our little reprieve because the house of cards could crumble at any moment. But why should I be happy when someone mistakes me for a 19-year-old? Why should that be good?

Consider how it looks from another perspective. A few years ago, I worked with a man whom everyone in my office assumed was about 22 or 23. He was wide-eyed and sweet and had this odd but endearing habit of bowing to people after he put work on their desks. When he shyly approached one of us to ask a question, we would smile condescendingly and answer in gentle tones. Nice kid, we thought.

So I remember trying very hard not to look shocked the day he told us he was 35. "Oh," someone said quietly. "I thought you were younger." No one said, "Wow! You look great." No one said, "Gosh, I wouldn't put you a day past 24." No one complimented him for looking so young, because we knew that 35-year-old men do not want to be mistaken for 22-year-olds. That the qualities that age brings — poise, confidence, wisdom — are qualities they want to project, qualities they should want to project. Which is not to say that men are completely immune from the beauty culture.

Indeed, in recent years, men have been going to the gym and the plastic surgeon in record numbers. "I definitely feel the pressure," says a man I know. "When I look at the guy on the underwear package I think, 'Wait a second — is my stomach supposed to have lines?'" But at this point, men are still not hearing the same relentless commentary that says younger is always better — a mantra that I don't think even squares with reality.

Think of Princess Diana. Surely one reason so many women adored her was that she so soundly broke this rule. For no one can deny that Diana-the-36-year-old-divorcee was far more beautiful than Diana-the-20-year-old-virgin-bride.

Anyway, that's what I told myself recently as I scanned my hair for gray streaks. But what I found instead was a small pimple on my chin. I'm sorry to say I was glad.

Rules of ladylike manner

Jessica Hoar

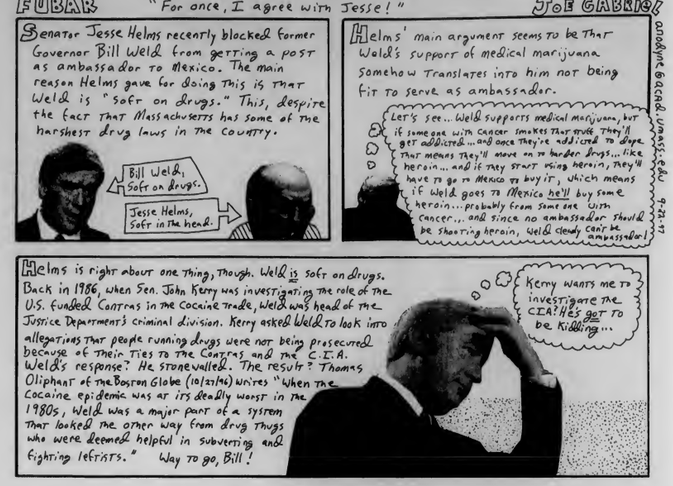
I almost got killed this weekend.

It was a typical Saturday night in the center of Amherst — a place that I didn't foresee as the possible location for my demise. My buds and I were walking across the street, when we were halfway through the crosswalk, this chick drove excessively fast right by us. If my friend hadn't yelled to me to look out, I would have been roadkill for sure. We gave her these looks and she yelled profanities out the window at us as she flew by. With my characteristic hesitance and timidity, I screamed, "Fk you," back at her. If any of you guys in town heard it... that was me. Sabrina, my normally smiling and supportive friend, gave me this exasperated look that reminded me of the high school teacher who told me that I was unladylike for telling some jerk to "shove it."

Since then I have been pondering what it means to be feminine. When I think of the lady who we're perpetually expected to be like, I see a prudish Victorian matron who sits primly with her knees and lips locked together and her hands folded neatly in her lap. Is it fun? No. Is it normal? Again, no. So why should we be like her? Besides, who acts like this anymore? So I have enlisted the help of the aforementioned Sabrina, and devised a list of rules for ladylike behavior.

No. 1: Giggle. Not constantly, but often enough so that it's characteristic. Don't laugh, but giggle quietly even when things are marginally funny. This will give the impression of being constantly amiable. It also gives you an air of innocence which will inevitably come in useful.

No. 2: Lip balm, lip balm, lip balm! Girls, this is a must. Your lips must always be moist and kissable. Chapstick is not the answer. Always use a fruity, sweet smelling brand.



No. 3: Cursing, profanity, vulgarity, whatever you call it, it's out. I'm sorry, but any interjection that is harsher than something said on Scooby Doo is just not cute. This could seriously jeopardize your aura of ladylike gentility.

No. 4: Physical coordination must be limited. If you're good at sports, make sure you're not too good. In other words, don't beat any guys. Violent reactions, such as punching, hitting and kicking must be done inaccurately, or if you do actually make contact, it must be soft and harmless, as if you are petting a butterfly.

No. 5: Be smart, but only in subjects that pertain to womanhood: clothing, makeup, hair, labor, birth... Mention that potholder you cross-stitched in the second grade. Mix up your sports. "They make goals in baseball, right?" You must never appear stupid, just uninformed, like you were absent that day in your class, or forgetful, like you knew it once, but it slipped your endlessly occupied mind.

So there you go, girls, the '90s guide to being ladylike. Now when your grandmother (or mother) rolls her eyes and throws her arms up at you and says, "Be more ladylike," you'll know what to do. For all those girls who are opinionated, quick-witted and defiant, for those who can catch a ball, throw a punch, and laugh a good guffaw, don't worry. If your friends give up on you ever being gentile and demure, like mine have, it's okay, these rules may not be meant for you either.

Prozac — Generation Next?

Jonathan Swartz

Flipping through the normally innocent pages of a recent Sports Illustrated, I suddenly found myself in the grips of a dystopian vision. "Depression Hurts," declared a gray caption beneath a black cartoon rain cloud. "Prozac can help," glowed a promise on the opposing page beneath the joyful rays of a yellow sun.

Like any commercially bombarded product of the 1970s, I am a tough "consuming unit" to shock. Anorexic, breast- implanted women pushing credit cards in lingerie rarely hold my attention for long. Michael Jordan is going to have a hard time selling me beef franks or jock straps. I don't believe that the beautiful humans in our oft-received J. Crew catalogs are really any happier than I am.

But this ad had me riveted. How dare Eli Lilly and Co. push a mind altering drug upon the over-prescribed, in debt American public using the same hoaky premises that sell sweaters and soda pop: "this product will make you happy?" I thought of the 1996 film Brain Candy, which laughs at a future society woozy on anti-depressants, and the aggressive marketing firms that feed its perversity.

Before outrage and conspiratorial paranoia had completely obscured my reason, I came upon a plan of action. I'd hit the five-million volume DuBois library. A pleasant reference librarian soon had me on the track of pharmaceutical ad critiques from Burma.

The information I found led me to two conclusions. First, the world is cleverly designed to prevent undergraduates from passing simple judgements on anything. Second, to hell with the first conclusion — this Prozac ad is shameful.

The drug makers have some legitimate arguments. They cite a report by the Journal of the American Medical Association that claims only one in ten Americans with real depressive disorders receives adequate treatment. One third receive no treatment at all. So Lilly is taking the benevolent task of raising public awareness about an illness as real and debilitating as schizophrenia and skin cancer. Taken in its most innocent form, the Prozac ad is informing the public that treatment is available for those who are hopelessly depressed, for whom Prozac may truly be a blessing.

The ad is an example of a broader push by pharmaceutical companies to place their products in the public consciousness, and in the public's medicine cabinets. Prescription advertising costs have risen from $100 million in 1992 to over $800 million in 1997. Under pressures from drug lobbyists and Congress, the Food and Drug Administration relaxed regulations on prescription advertising this August. Now, sellers of anti-depressants and other prescription products can plug the benefits of their panaceas without the lengthy disclaimers that made previous ads impractical. Prozac may soon be coming to a television near you!

So what's dangerous about these ads? First, under a veneer of responsible messages is the subtle persuasion that marks all good advertising. "You got a problem? We've got an easy solution." Not getting enough sex? Buy J. Crew boxers! Feeling down? How 'bout a little Prozac? Sure you need your doctor's permission, but how many people do you know who've convinced their doctors into making a quick prescription?

Lilly would have you think that Prozac is an automatic cure. Their sales pitch concludes with "Prozac has been prescribed for more than 17 million Americans. [gulp!] Chances are that someone you know is feeling again because of it."

Feeling sunny? As with all advertising, exaggerated optimism is used to boost consumer confidence, regardless of inglorious realities. Prozac has had very inconsistent results in treating depression.

Seen from a broader context, ads like this one feed a dangerous trend occurring gradually before our noses. The ancient bumps and bruises of human psychology and behavior are being patched up with quick fix drugs. Some depression is physiological and chronic. Much of it is part of everyone's troublesome internal dialogue: how do I stay happy? Searching for a lasting answer to that question is an experience not to be missed.

One UMass student told me of a boy he met as a substitute teacher in a local first grade classroom. The kid was good natured and very energetic — perhaps a bit of a spazz, as we used to call them. He would come to class a little dopey in the mornings but warm up as the day went on. But after his lunchtime dose of Ritalin he'd come back to class subdued and lifeless. "It's wrong!" the UMass student stated emphatically.

I agree. In an age of convenience, it is too tempting to take pills or give them to your kids instead of confronting difficulties that beg for careful attention and patient understanding. But Lilly and the $2.4 billion a year Prozac industry have other ideas.

Letters to the Editor

Sometimes mistakes are made

To the Editor:

In Jason Davis's editorial "Improving the Connecticut" in the Sept. 17 Collegian, I couldn't help but notice that he made one glaring factual error. In his article about the cleanup of the once grossly polluted Connecticut River, he states, "[The] river... stretches 410 miles from the Canadian border to its mouth on the Atlantic — longer than the Tiber, the Jordan or the Nile."

The Nile river is actually about 4,157 miles in length from its farthest source near Tanzania to its mouth on the Mediterranean, making it possibly the world's longest river and also over ten times longer than Jason Davis's quoted length of the Connecticut. Perhaps Davis should research his facts more carefully in the future to avoid blemishing an otherwise informative and excellent article on an important topic.

Moore tackles SEALs in latest film

Director Ridley Scott shows off provocative genius in G.I. Jane

By Adam Levine
Collegian Staff

G.I. Jane
Directed by Ridley Scott with Demi Moore, Viggo Mortenson, Anne Bancroft
Playing at Hampshire Six Theater

America has always had a curiosity, or perhaps an obsession with movies about war. Even when Hollywood ran out of stories about every war in history, they started making military films about other things. These included films depicting both the sensationalism and the struggles of being a part of the military, the training, the authority, but mostly the violence.

G.I. Jane is one of those latter films, a bit like Edward Zywick's Courage Under Fire or Rob Reiner's A Few Good Men, which attempts to dig deep into the heart of one of America's most intriguing political organizations, the US Military. Films such as these wish to tell us that there is more to our armed services than security and defense, there's also a whole lot of hierarchy and dark secrets hidden within all the bureaucracy. Yet, throughout all these plot formulas, G.I. Jane goes that extra mile; it really wants to say that war is hell even when we're not fighting one.

The credit can truly go to one of the shining examples of film-making genius, director Ridley Scott. Ever since he made a name for himself back in 1977 with his creepy yet, melodic sci-fi thriller Alien, Scott has remained a perfect example of Hollywood non-conformity. His directing is continuously provocative and his films each contain underlinings of important social drama. The same can be enthusiastically said about his latest project, yet even the director can only have so much control. The flaws of G.I. Jane are not a result of Scott's talent, however, the film's strengths are.

G.I. Jane is a complicated, often messy, military drama about women's roles in combat. Demi Moore makes a hopeful attempt to be taken seriously and utilize her talent which so often eludes her. Moore's character is a pawn within a shady military game, which is controlled by a US senator played by Anne Bancroft, in a short but dominating performance. The game consists of using intelligence officer Lt. Jordan O'Neill (Demi Moore) as the first woman allowed to enroll in the Navy SEAL's training program. In the hope of furthering her career, O'Neill excepts the offer unaware that she is scrupulously being manipulated by the senator.

What follows is a story about equality and determination as the betrayed O'Neill pleads for a chance to finish the training and more importantly, prove a point to herself and to our patriarchal society. Viggo Mortenson, in an explosive performance, creates a disturbing role as the drill instructor in charge of the cadets' training. His purpose is to destroy O'Neill's determination, but through it all, including a silly fist fight by both characters, he learns to respect her.

Scott captures the grueling torture of the SEAL's training through magnificent camera work and editing. Often the camera appears to be hand held as it relentlessly follows the cadets running straight into the world of hell that Scott has created for them. He uses Moore as an object to set up his scenarios, including close-ups of her shaving her head that are so moving, you can't help but feel her shattered ego falling down with every strand of hair. Scott's best work to date, however, may be an overhead shot of Moore standing off center of the frame, appearing lonely and helpless as the camera sweeps in from above.

It is directing and cinematography such as this that makes G.I. Jane an impressive and accomplished work, yet it is not as inspiring as it could have been. Where Scott's Thelma and Louise really touched a nerve, many aspects of G.I. Jane do not fit together nicely. The assumption is made that the audience has previous knowledge of military jargon and as a result, the film becomes more confusing than it ought to be. There is a struggle to keep up with the numerous plot shifts as the characters use terminology that makes the film appear realistic yet somehow intangible.

G.I. Jane can be enjoyed best if one allows himself to watch it on a different level than what it hopes to achieve. However, G.I. Jane should be given the credit it deserves and its message is still important and worthy of discussion. Scott tries hard to avoid the classification of a feminist story by using Moore to constantly explain that she's not a poster child. The film is a sharp criticism of the American military system including many of the prejudices it contains. G.I. Jane, in its most simple definition, is a story about how anybody can do anything if they try really hard and don't let anyone get in their way.

A hardcore dedication to Raybeez

COURTESY VICTORY RECORDS

Cause for Alarm releases new EP.

I'd like to start this week's column by paying tribute to Warzone front-man Raybeez. Hardcore suffered a major loss when, at the age of 35, Raybeez passed away last week due to complications from pneumonia. Raybeez was a man who dedicated his life to hardcore; he was there in the beginning when he used to drum for Agnostic Front and he was there until his death as the singer for Warzone.

What set Raybeez apart was that he sincerely cared about the scene and tried to make it better for the kids. He was always at shows with a big smile and a warm hug for anyone in the crowd. He made, "Don't Forget The Struggle, Don't Forget The Streets," a hardcore anthem. Raybeez epitomized the idea of hardcore as a lifestyle rather then a trend and he will be sorely missed.

On a brighter note, Victory Records was busy this summer with a slew of releases and I'm going to try to present them all to you. The contestants on Victory's best recent release are: By The Grace of God from Louisville, Cast Iron Hike from Boston, Cause For Alarm from New York City, Integrity from Cleveland, and Strife from Los Angeles. Let the games begin.

Cast Iron Hike — Watch It Burn — The packaging on this CD is incredible, rivaling the works of art Doghouse and Initial have presented us with before. If you've liked Cast Iron Hike in the past you should buy this album because it exceeds their previous efforts. If you've never heard of them they sound like a weird cross between Quicksand, Deadguy and a rock band only not as awesome as that combination sounds. The big problem with this band is vocalist Jacob Otis Brennan who sounds like he'd be better suited to sing in leather pants with a bandanna-tied microphone. Between the vocals and the occasional stadium rock riffs this album falls on its face. D+

Integrity — Seasons in the Size of the Day — The angriest band is back with 11 more anthems of doom and annihilation. This album is a lot faster than most of their past efforts, bordering on speed metal in a lot of parts. The biggest departure from their past is that Dwid actually sings on some of the songs, not that you can understand what he is saying. With song titles like "Diseased Prey Within Casing" and "Burning Flesh Children To Mist" this isn't the most optimistic album. It'll still kick your teeth in though. B

Cause for Alarm — Birth after Birth — Wasting no time after the release of Cheaters and Cheated is Cause for Alarm's follow up EP. CFA play true blue hardcore which means fast, short songs with just enough breakdowns to keep you interested. They diversify their sound a little bit with the Oi influenced "Summer on Avenue A" and the intense "Killing Children." If you like to mosh with your hood on, you'll love this album. B

Strife — In This Defiance — Judge is back with Bringing it Down Part 2, I mean Strife just released their second full length. Okay no one will ever accuse Strife of being the most original band, especially on this album, but at the same time you always know you're going to get an album that will make you want to point your finger and yell "Go!" They've toned down the back up vocals so it no longer sounds like a pack of angry dogs and they've gotten rid of the acoustic intros on the last album which has helped a lot. Most of you have already made up your mind about this band, but either way there's no denying they are fun to listen to. B+

And the winner is...

By The Grace of God — Perspective — Hands down, the best album Victory Records has ever released. This band features ex-members of Endpoint and destroys everything that legendary band has ever done. They combine the best elements of Dag Nasty, Ignition, Embrace and Gorilla Biscuits and combine them with intelligent and insightful lyrics. I could go into a detailed review of this album but instead I'll leave you with this: remember when you first got into hardcore and the speed, energy, intensity and integrity of the music overwhelmed you? Remember how those songs made you feel unstoppable and on top of the world? Remember how those bands made you feel like someone does understand and you're not alone? Well, Perspective will make you feel that way again. A

Some upcoming Victory releases to look forward to are: on Oct. 21 Warzone's Fight For Justice and on November 11 Hatebreed's Satisfaction Is The Death of Desire and the Bad Brains Omega Sessions.

As an ALANA student, how do you feel about being brushed off by the administration?

"It's very disappointing that the administration doesn't take the ALANA students' voice into account."

Linda Tara-Tugwell
Post-graduate
Political Science

"It's more on the students to make the administration fulfill the commitments. As for the administration, there have been changes in personnel, i.e. the new Provost, which is a huge opportunity for students to install new policies on campus."

Mashammoquet
Soph/Jr
Legal Studies

"It shows the administration doesn't take students seriously and in their eyes, the Goodell takeover was a joke. If the administration doesn't start to take ALANA students' demands seriously then they'll have a major problem on their hands."

Jamie Morrison
Post-graduate
Sociology

"It seems like the Whitmore administration hasn't gotten the message. It's disturbing to see that nothing is being done and I wonder why."

Syed Bokhari

"I really haven't seen many of the promises being fulfilled on campus. Everything seems to be pretty much like prior to the take-over. Personally, I think they should work on ALANA retention more than anything else."

Jalene Tamerat

Political Science

"I don't believe that Goodell should have happened because if you know UMass's history, you would know that we took over Whitmore in 1992 and the University did not keep their promises. Just because the Administration says that they are going to do something doesn't mean that they'll do it."

Afro-American graduate enrollment plummets

Editors note: This article appeared in the September 1997 issue of The Graduate Voice.

Despite claims by administrators at Whitmore that they are working to diversify its student populations, our view of the statistics found in the UMass Factbooks, show that the African American graduate population has declined 49 percent in the past 23 years. While the general graduate student population has risen by 15 percent between 1974 and 1995, according to UMass' Office of Institutional Research (OIR), the African American graduate student population has declined to 53 percent of 1974 levels. In 1996, the percentage continued to decline to 51 percent. Thirty departments or programs (with 15 or more students) at UMass had no African American representation on the graduate level. African Americans on the graduate level accounted for 1 percent or less at three schools on campus (the Schools of Management, Engineering and Math and Natural Science). Across the campus, only 2.6 percent of the graduate population is African American.

Thomas Taaffe

From a University high of 307 African Americans enrolled on a graduate level in 1974, that number had plummeted to an all time low of 134 in 1993 or a scant 44 percent of previous levels. After GEO (Graduate Employment Organization) contract-mandated increases in funding to the Office of Graduate Minority Recruitment (OMGSR) and the work of activists in GSS led to slight increases in African American enrollment, those numbers have ranged between 151 (1994), 156 (1996), and 162 (1995).

While African Americans, Latino Americans and Asian Americans are the fastest growing ethnic groups in Massachusetts, only Asian Americans have shown consistent and sustained growth on the graduate level, rising from 112 in 1974 to an all time high of 181 in 1995 (178 in 1996).

MISER (Massachusetts Institute for Social & Economic Research), in its ongoing study of US Census data has projected that ALANA communities will account for 30 percent of the total Massachusetts populations by 2010. Native American graduate enrollment has remained statistically insignificant throughout the years in question, ranging from a low of 8 in 1992 to an all time high of 20 in 1996. While Latino graduate populations grew significantly for some years, rising from 59 in 1974 to a high of 217 in 1988, their numbers have dwindled since then. Latino enrollment in 1996 was 166, or 78 percent of 1988 totals. Total ALANA graduate representation on campus last year amounted to 8.8 percent of the total graduate population. Those students considered as ALANA include all American born citizens, foreign born citizens and resident aliens. Only non-resident aliens are calculated as international students (non-ALANA).

Administrators at UMass continue to tout statistics that claim a graduate ALANA enrollment of 15.6 percent. The University arrives at these numbers by deducting the 24 percent of the graduate student body that does not report ethnicity and the 19 percent international graduate student body from the whole and then calculates the percentages. By removing 2,610 (43 percent) people from a grand total of 5,955, UMass administrators can boost the percentage of graduate ALANA students from 8.8 percent to 15.8 percent.

Changes in the way UMass administrators calculate ALANA representation happened in two stages. Following the 1992 ALANA accords, the next UMass Fact Book (1994) removed international students from the count of the whole. In the subsequent Fact Book (1996), Whitmore removed non-reporting students from the count of the whole. It would seem that, when faced with the responsibility of increasing the number of ALANA students on the campus, the administration simply manipulated the numbers instead.

It was this kind of statistical practice that led, in part to the Goodell takeover a few months ago. While Administrators admitted that they had not succeeded in reaching the 20 percent undergraduate ALANA enrollment that their Fact Books claimed, they have, thus far, not made the same admission on the graduate level.

Despite this alarming decline, most administrators in Whitmore remain unconcerned, although Charlene Seymour, the Dean of the Graduate School, has embarked on a number of programs to address the paucity of ALANA students. Claiming that the University ranks seventh in awarding advanced degrees to African Americans (a figure that may have more to do with history than present practice), the University ignores the fact that it has been shutting down programs that have the greatest ALANA enrollment. This has been particularly significant in the School of Education, where a number of programs with high ALANA enrollment have been disbanded in the past ten years.

A department by department review of "minority" enrollment reveals the paucity of ALANA representation in a wide variety of programs. The absence or near absence of any ALANA representation In these programs reveals much about institutional racism on this campus. On the level of a college or school, the School of Nursing stands out as the worst on campus in its recruitment of ALANA students on the graduate level. Out of 149 graduate students, the School of Nursing has only seven ALANA graduate students in this programs, or 4.7 percent of its population. Only 5.8 percent of both Food and Natural Resources (29 out of 498) and Natural Science and Math (39 out of 670) are ALANA. ALANA representation among non-degree graduate students stands at 5.9 percent (62 out of 1056). Only 6.2 percent of the School of Management's graduate enrollment is ALANA. The College of Engineering has only 6.6 percent of its population identified as ALANA.

While chronic under-enrollment of undergraduate ALANA students continues to violate both the 1992 ALANA agreements and the 1997 Goodell agreements, the number of ALANA graduate students falls far below even the undergraduate levels for significant reasons. While to a certain point, undergraduates may choose their college, on the graduate level, the faculty chooses grad students.

Therefore the failure of the university to recruit grad students belongs not only to the administrators, but to the faculty as well. That entire departments have not enrolled any ALANA students into their graduate programs speaks about the depth and nature of institutionalized racism at UMass.

Thomas Taaffe is a UMass Graduate Student.

"New and Improved" code

The letter, "University of Massachusetts Guidelines for Responses to Demonstrations on University Property" from President William M. Bulger and Chancellor David K. Scott to all students and staff at the University of Massachusetts is a clear attempt to intimidate workers and students from exercising their legitimate right to protest. The "new and improved" picketing code is now expanded to include University employees as well as students. It also expands the terms of what is considered a violation under the old picketing code. These changes have been made from high and unilaterally imposed without consultation with the campus unions or student governing bodies. Both the guidelines and their implantation, are an infringement of worker and student rights.

Mahmood Ketabchi

Jennifer Fasulo

All protests last year were nonviolent and caused no damage to University property. Yet protests such as the worker and student rally against parking increases, the GEO (Graduate Employment Organization) rallies for a fair contract and the Goodell Occupation, would all be considered in violation of the new picketing "guidelines." Any workers or students participating in such protests under the new guidelines would be subject to expulsion and/or firing. The picketing "guidelines" are so broad and ambiguous that the administration can virtually declare any kind of protest illegal and take disciplinary action at its whims and discretions. Such absolute power is dangerous and reactionary and should be categorically rejected.

After handing down this gauntlet, the Chancellor assures us that the University still adheres to the principles of freedom of speech. But freedom of speech is meaningless if it does not include freedom to assemble and protest. He claims that he must draw a clear line between dissent and disruption. But the line between the two is merely a matter of interpretation. It is an arbitrary line, that no one serious about challenging injustice can draw. The whole history of the Civil Rights Movement shows that dissent and disruption cannot be separated. He also claims that the "guidelines" are meant to protect those members of the community whose rights are undermined by protest. This is a fallacy and an attempt to divide communities whose rights are intertwined. No one benefits from the attempt to curtain freedom of speech and assembly. Freedom of speech, freedom to dissent, freedom to assemble and protest, are the foundations of democratic practice, without which we are left with autocratic rule and intimidation.

In addition to creating fear and intimidation, the controversy regarding the picketing code "guidelines," serves as a distraction from the real issues which lead worker and student protests. For years the University has systematically engaged in practices which have excluded or discouraged students of color and poor and working people from attending or remaining at the University. Such practices include but are not limited to administratively withdrawing students for debts as little as $20, failure to provide due process rights for students subjected to the above discrimination, failure to provide affordable child care for thousands of student and worker families, failure to recruit and retain students of color, particularly graduate students of color and failure to pay graduate employees a living wage.

The new semester has begun and we see the same patterns of institutional injustice before us — students are still being unjustly administratively withdrawn, due process is still absent, programs that were promised protection have been threatened once again, child care is still unaffordable, enrollment of students of color is down and graduate employees are in their 19th month without a new contract.

If the University Administration were truly interested in avoiding a large-scale protest, they would work at eliminating these on-going and systematic problems, honor their agreements with students and settle the GEO contract, rather than attempting to curtail our basic and constitutional freedoms.

Jennifer Fasulo is the GEO Vice President and Mahmood Ketabchi is the GEO President.

This political cartoon contains an image that first appeared in the April 24, 1996 edition of the Collegian Multicultural Affairs Page. Affectionately referred to as "the graph," it contained the graphic image of a middle finger used to express the acute dissatisfaction of ALANA students in regard to statistics for students of color. The bar graph that displayed the undergraduate student population highly resemebled a hand gesture whose offensive nature was balanced by the addition of the actual figures.

It subsequently created a stir throughout the entire University, Its particular focus was to answer the questions, "What happened to the 1992 ALANA Agreements?" and, "What needs to be done for 1996?"

To answer these questions, the editor printed a series of articles that effectively put the '92 ALANA Agreements back into campus discourse. "The graph," was most controversial at this time, not only for its crude character but also for what it symbolized: the gross under–representation of ALANA students on campus, and the University's neglect to honor the ALANA Agreements.

Clearly the message behind "the graph" is still highly relevant given the new picketing code and the troubled negotiations.

Write for Diversity!

Students of color comprise less than 17 percent of the total UMass population. Even if you grew up in a diverse environment, at UMass, people of color are still in the minority, and unfortunately, we are still treated that way. If you've ever had a thought that you've wanted to write down, if you've ever been angry at something that you've witnessed as a person of color, if you've always wanted to cover the events happening in your community, if you've ever written a song lyric or poem, we need you.

At the Collegian there are six diversity desks, Black Affairs, Developing Nations, GLBT Affairs, Jewish Affairs, Multicultural Affairs, and Women's Issues. Two desks, Black Affairs and Multicultural Affairs have weekly pages, which appear in the Collegian every Monday and Tuesday, respectively. In addition, the diversity desks regularly run stories in news, arts, and living, editorial/opinion and sports.

The Diversity Desks came out of organized student protest for fair and accurate reporting about issues which occur in communities of color and in the Third World. Anyone from the UMass community is invited to take part in these desks.

The Diversity desks are seeking interested writers to take part in the struggle for social justice. We need people who want to learn how to report, write editorials, edit stories, take pictures, or draw. Please help us in continuing the struggle to fight oppression in all forms. No experience is necessary. Come down to the Collegian, located in the basement of the Campus Center or call us at 545-1851.

Post Goodell:
How far have we come?

Goodell: Making it Personal

037This is the first of a three part series continuing the discussion of Goodell. In the next two editorials the author will examine the role of Asian American students in protests, and will then discuss why the Honors College needs to be protested.

As the saga of last spring's week-long occupation of Goodell continues with negotiations to hammer out the details of the alleged "commitments," most of us who were inside the building, and those who were on the outside making sure the world was watching, are probably trying hard to make sense of it all.

With the attempt to rationalize any experience comes the inevitability of placing the struggle into a personal context. If you asked participants of the takeover, "Why did you do it?" you would surely hear very different answers from the undercover student security team sent in to eavesdrop, or from Chief Luippold's omnipresent police cadre, or from some elusive administrators who floated like ghosts and masqueraded as allies. No doubt, folks were coming from all different levels— it was by no means strictly support. There were infiltrators. But just as there were forces to undermine negotiations, steadfast students in the struggle responded in kind by reaching into their own resources. This support amounted to live radio shows from inside the building, thanks to DJs from WMUA; live telecasts for people watching at home, thanks to the crew from UVC; and outstanding, comprehensive reports from the Collegian.

UMass media made the difference. The Goodell Web page received over a thousand hits mid–way into the takeover, from Los Angeles to Singapore. The New York Times, NPR, and CNN despite their coverage, could not possibly touch this.

Viraphanh Douangmany

The Goodell occupation attracted a union of people unprecedented in my college career. I heard of the 1992 takeover of Memorial Hall. I even participated in the 1994 Admissions building takeover. But 1997 rocked the house — and almost tore it down. I knew from my first year at UMass — I knew while still a senior in high school at Boston Latin Academy — that UMass Amherst was a hotbed for activism. As I came to learn about UMass and know it for myself, I began to see why; Mass is also full of reactionaries.

In January 1993, Liz Walker from WBZ, now an affiliate station of CBS, did a program focusing on the tragedies and turmoils of UMass. She interviewed activists from various communities of color who had been protesting the administration's neglect and irresponsibility in handling issues of racial violence on campus, and other examples of disregard for students' civil rights and well–being. One student was able to capture the essence of any progressive struggle on campus with this statement: "UMass is a land– grant institution whose mission is to serve the working class of the Commonwealth. It must remain accessible."

THANG VO / COLLEGIAN

Outside of the Goodell Takeover in early March, 1997. This photo depicts one of the several rallies held during the six day occupation.

Within the past decade...

Chronicling the litany of events that have helped shape the landscape for UMass activism would be far too great a task. So much has happened on this campus that people would just not believe it. Take for example, just 10 years ago, Yvette Henry, a black Resident Assistant from Southwest, was falsely accused of setting a series of fires across campus. Before the real culprit was arrested, Henry was detained and questioned in Dickinson for hours before she had any legal counsel. The FBI had stepped into the picture. They were called upon by a helpless UMass administration feeling the heat of parents complaining that building fire alarm evacuations were disrupting their childrens' studies. Henry became an irresistible target. Because she was black, and a chemistry major holding a position of some authority, Henry fit the FBI profile of the individual who was setting fires to trash cans and bulletin boards in dormitories and other buildings across campus. She was withdrawn from school and pending her trial, was only able to attend classes if her mother accompanied her.

She was later found not guilty. The person responsible for setting the fires was a maintenance woman on medication for a mental illness. Henry then employed lawyers from the UMass Legal Service Center (supported by student fees) to sue the University. She won and was awarded an undisclosed amount of money. It has been speculated, however, that the amount was in the millions.

Immediately, the Trustees of UMass voted to abolish the rights of Legal Services to litigate on any cases against the University. In 1994, SCERA (the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy) launched a campaign to reinstate litigation rights and had limited success.

A couple of years after the Henry event, another black RA was subjected to racial epithets and vandalism to his property, including feces smeared on his door. Frequent reports did little to stop the harassment which escalated to a physical attack. Students who were angered at the lack of initiative and less than illustrious response from the police stormed the high rise where the attack took place and demanded that campus police and the University take action to ensure safety and protection for students of color on campus facing the brunt of rising racial hostility.

In a separate incident in February 1994, an Asian student finishing up his senior year, was kicked in the head, called a "chink" and got his jacket stolen by a white man who had mistaken him for another Asian man. He was attacked between the Fine Arts Center and Memorial Hall at around 5 p.m. His attacker was finally charged with civil rights violations a year later.

In December 1995, two Asian American students who were wanted by campus police, made a call into Dickinson expressing a willingness to comply. The students were told to come down into the station. When they arrived, police greeted them with guns aimed at their heads.

Putting it into perspective

For me, the reasons why I was in Goodell were crystal clear. Also, I was impressed by the caliber of leadership that set off the protest. I did not expect such a level of faith and unity, and was overwhelmed by the spirit of compassion. I learned a lot about negotiations and people. I witnessed how perspectives can be shaped and tainted according to prior contacts and relationships, professional and/or personal. Trust was critical but it came surprisingly easy for people who hardly knew each other, if at all.

Once again, the reason for being there fell along similar lines spoken by students in 1993, access. It always was and it always will be. The struggle in Goodell called for but was not limited to increased need–based financial aid, affordable childcare, and an assurance that academic support programs for students of color would not be eradicated. Furthermore, the struggle called for the creation of a Native American Academic Support Program to be created along with ethnic studies.

I hope that new students will take on the challenge to keep open the doors of higher education and the promise that comes with it to our younger brothers and sisters. I remember a conversation three years ago with a sister that was inside Memorial Hall reminding me that it (the struggle) was about making sure that Cambodians and Laotians made it in here and graduated. She went on to say that programs like Upward Bound which help students from the city prepare for college, needed to be reinstated at UMass. She went on to say how important it was to decolonize our minds. I was thinking, I'm from Laos. I went through Upward Bound. What does this Korean woman know about Laotians and Cambodians and Upward Bound? It didn't take me too long to find out she was absolutely right.

ALANA Agreements

You will notice that within these two pages there are several references to the 1992 ALANA Agreements. The background for these agreements, however, is missing and it is crucial to know.

The 1992 ALANA Agreements were the culmination to a series of racially motivated crimes that took place that year (see "Making it Personal" by V. Douangmany). The Justice Department had to be called in to quell the situation and to mediate between the administration and the irate students. What resulted were the ALANA Agreements: a set of 10 demands which were to be met within five years of their conception. Among the list of demands were an increase in ALANA student admissions (minimum 20 percent) and faculty, a call for more student scholarships, and a call to re– name the Columbus Day holiday, among others.

Five years later, when the administration publlshed a report charting the progress of these agreements, they made it seem like most, if not all, of the agreements had been met, when in fact, they had not. In the case of student enrollment, the administration played whih the numbers (as they have in T. Taaffe's article) to get the 20 percent minimum. In the case of re–naming Columbus day, administrators blamed the students' lack of participation in carrying out these changes.

In early March 1997, ALANA students demanded that these ten agreements be fulfilled. The six day takeover of Goodell was the result sending a diverse group of students, into another round of negotiations with stalling administrators. To no one's surprise, these negotiations have been static and are coupled with a new gagging code to prohibit any further "disruption."

Fortunately, students cannot be quelled that easily.

La Purificación de Chacón Quirós de Quetzalcóatl

¡Eh! camalito[1], how are you?

Me quedé viendo anodadado a este hombre alto e imponente. Debía cubrir el marco de la puerta con unas espaldas dignas de todas las insignias de un general, y bueno, la verdad es que tenía un aire militar. Unable to react I examined him slowly, de arriba a abejo.

–En todo caso debería responderle algo pronto porque hace ya un rato que me mira muy serio, aunque ahora, fijándome bien tiene un bigote[2] de esos que no se ven desde aquellos viejos tiempos de la revolución, grueso y alargado, medio Pancho, medio Emiliano[3].

Juan Jose' Chacon

Sí, sí, además esa camisa de calaveras[4]...pero, ¿qué le pasa? falta más de medio año para el Día de los Muertos[5], y, sí, encima con botas de cuero de culebra y para peor de colmos con punta metálica, sí, como la rima[6] que cantaba yo cuando estaba chiquillo: una vie ja–ja, mató un ga to–to con la pun ta–ta del zapa to–to...De fijo que este carajo no es de por acá.

Yes que no puede ser, esa faja con hebilla metálica en forma de culebras no es muy british que digamos. Talvéz, debería responderle, eh, sí, pero, ¿qué le digo?: ar llu Mexican?

No, ¡que va!, ¿él por casualidad no es y me revienta la cara? No, más rápido, pensá, eh...pobre vieja, pobre gato, pobre punta del zapa...¡no! no eso, pensá ham, pensá, ¿qué le digo?, ah sí, eh...ar yu a Gringo[7]? No, ¡imbécil!, peor todavía, después de verdad es Gringo y me acusan de esa pendejada, sí, esa mierda que yo ni entiendo, como es que le dicen...sí, sí, acordáte de la maldita palabra, se parece al bigote de este carajo...bigote, bigotón, bigotillo, eh, síii, síii... bigotiii!

"Is this 77 North Prospect Street? I'm suppose to stay here for the next two weeks...My name is Guillermo but in this country they call me Gwermo. I'm a performance artist from Mexico, you know...the landlady told me that she would have two rooms ready for me and my partner, Roberto."

"Ah yes, now I remember, claro, claro, come in... they're ready, I'll show you around..."

Of course! the Gringa from New Zealand, la Momia de Guanajuato[8], la landlady from Hell, told me to wait for two guys but she never mentioned anything about the reincarnation of Pancho Villa, the biggest Mexican since El Santo[9] and his companion...¡ah! ya lo veo, ahí viene, pero que es esto, un desfile de estereotipos, porque éste también está bien extraño, mucho más joven aunque menos grandulón[10], pero todo tatuado, pelo largo a media espalda, argollas, camisa sin mangas; en fin, todo un perfecto, un verdadero disidente urbano.

Debe ser un Chicano pero de los de verdad, ¿se enojará si le pregunto si es de Istelc[11]? ¿Estará en un gun? De fijo que sí, hasta tiene las barbas de chivo, gouti que le llaman acá. Al rato estuvo en esta película que me contó Manuel, los Vatos Locos...¿será amigo del Mero–Mero[12] o un simple güero[13]?

And so I began to live with the Vato[14] and the Aztec, two pendejos[15] with a mission to reconquer Aztlán[16] from the Gringos through performance art. Like Don Quijote y Sancho Panza, they would become more like the other and less like themselves, trading personalities throughout the journey, just like my teacher de Literatura Española taught me: from la Mequijotización del Chicano to la Sanchicanización del Mexicano.

Y yo estaba parado ahí en medio de todo esto, en un momento en que mi alma hacia las de Sor Juana y se partía en dos y no precisamente entre la razón y la pasión. La mía era y es una ruptura que va a la raíz: recently self–exiled for lack of political participation en mi tierra, I opened the gates of the Yankee prison hoping to find a cell–mate, alguien que me abra el pecho y me saque ese espiritu maligno y adormecedor. ¡Qué vida esta que me da por hacerme el importante!

When the night of their performance came, I was wearing mi mejor mudada, a black three piece suit con todo y guayabera[17] blanca encajada[18], zapatos de charol, pendiente de oro antropomorfo y bien, bien, bien parfumee. En fin me creía el muy galán, but more importantly I was there to assess mi so–called identity, in constant flux, always frail cuando creo estar fuerte.

Y como Don Quijote y Sancho Panza, Gwermo High–tech Aztec and Roberto Cyber–Vato, left me tainted with their powerful non apologetic performance that included the pounding of a real chicken on stage asi como los de la Eleipidi[19] le hacen a los Chicanos en la verdadera realidad. When I went to the train station para el último abrazo, I was allowed to keep their magical performance charro[20] and a kilo of Brazil nuts.

Days passed without interpretation. I would spend hours trying to go to sleep, chewing the Brazil nuts, mirando fijamente al charro, but I knew something was wrong, realmente bien...the night que comencé a soñar que despertaba de madrugada, only to find the High–Tech Aztec screaming at me with Cyber–Vato at his side holding the ceremonial baton.

–¡Ah! cabroncito finalmente te tengo aquí, solo tú y yo, culero...¡What! ¡You taught you would get away with that pinche identity of yours! No, no lo creo. Vengo a repasar tus cuentas, and don't forget: ¡you might just end up in la fucking Chingada! I know exactly lo que estás pensando:

"I mean, what to make of all these loqueras? I feel a bit confucio & lonesome tonight...Are you vatos still alive? Yo estoy aquí muriéndome en América, ca, ca, ca–put...la gran soledad de los United pero bien united...de los cojones, I mean...estamos united, ¿qué no?, unidos por el temor y la soledad...Qué issue, man? Que tiempos nos han tocado vivir. Que western utopia ni que la chingada...dans la grand topographie de fin de siécle, ¡ay güey![21]

–You have to fight!, come on get your stupid degree and get out of this country. Can't you see we're doing fine without you! Look you Taco–Tico–Culero, realize that we are the ones doing the re–conquering now, if you want do some of your own go back to San Juan or San José or wherever that place is...

–¡Cállate Roberto!...Mira, Juan, sal de aquí apenas puedas...I saw tus ojos en la performance, como chispeaban con cada golpe que Roberto le daba al fresh pollo, como tus manos se encrispaban en busca del baton, the chicken's blood flowing through the stage and yours al corazón.

Yes, I saw you and tu sonrisa cuando los Gringos miraban perplejos, remembering aquel Día de los Muertos, when you burned them all in effigy: Clinton, Bush, North, Helms, Lake, todos tus ghosts, ¡los quemaste a todos!; when you came out of el sótano como un ser político, con pasión y razón, that day when you spilled la sangre de los muertos encima de ellos, nuestros enemigos en honor a los nuestros.

What do you think, ¿qué yo no te ví cabrón? Of course, I was there with you en todo momento, cuando les pusiste la carne de los corazones encima and later prayed for their souls, yes, las de los Gringos, ¡hasta los perdonaste!

Te ví como soñabas cuando Roberto recogía las plumas del chicken, sí, you were dreaming of your own dress, all feathers like your angel, the feathered serpent, el Quetzalcóatl[22] tuyo, con tu pecho en sangre y tus alas esmeraldas, buscando el peñon abandonado for the last dance with all your avatars: the passage to the underworld, yes...back home. ¡No me olvides!, in this land they call me Gwermo Go–Mex Piña y por siempre te acompañare en tu camino...

Minutewomen take Burlington by storm

By Jim Eltringham
Collegian Correspondent

A cold, rainy afternoon did not stop the Massachusetts women's cross-country team from capturing first place honors at last Saturday afternoon's Vermont Invitational in Burlington, Vt.

The Minutewomen's 31 points were good enough to beat out Boston University (39 points), Vermont (60) and Central Connecticut State (112).

BU was impressive, placing three runners in the top five, but the Minutewomen countered the Terriers' thunder squall with a steady rain of their own, capturing five places in the top ten. For the second consecutive week, senior Christy Martin was the top finisher for UMass, leading the charge with a third place finish, and a time of 18:38.

Just five seconds behind her was fellow senior Rebecca Donaghue, good for fourth place at a time of 18:43. Although senior Katie Greenia finished seventh at 18:53, coach Julie LaFreniere was quick to add that up until "the last 800 yards or so," she was challenging the top five.

BU	39

Junior Tracy Meagher's time of 19:11 was eighth, and freshman Melissa Henderson's time of 19:15 garnered ninth place, and rounded out an impressive display of teamwork.

LaFreniere cited depth as a key factor in the success this year's squad has achieved.

"Tracy Meagher and Melissa Henderson are holding us together...they make us a tighter and better team," LaFreniere said.

"This proves that cross country is a team sport. BU has a great top three, but they don't have fourth and fifth runners like we do."

Furthermore, LaFreniere emphasized the importance of finishing in close clusters, with Greenia, Meagher, and Henderson finishing in seventh, eighth, and ninth place, respectively.

"By the end of the season, we hope to have seven women finishing in a pack," LaFreniere said.

UMass will need to continue working as a team, because some questions still linger regarding the health of Donaghue. Despite her strong showing on Saturday, the chronic heel problems which have bothered her since spring remain a concern.

"We're taking our time with her," LaFreniere said.

The Minutewomen now turn their attention to training for October 4th, when they will compete in the Paul Short Invitational in Bethlehem, Pa.

Approximately 30 teams will be joining UMass, and some of them are nationally ranked.

LaFreniere plans to continue training despite the off week, promising that the upcoming meet "should be a good test of what kind of team we have."

Minutemen's Maine competition in Vt.

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Correspondent

Led by senior Ryan Carrara's second place overall finish, the University of Massachusetts men's cross country team placed fourth at Saturday's meet in Vermont with 76 points. The University of Maine won the overall competition, followed by Boston University, Vermont, UMass, and Central Connecticut State.

Maine and BU battled neck and neck for the meet victory, both placing two runners in the top five. The Black Bears, who scored 45 points to the Terriers' 47, had their top three runners returning from last year, unlike the Minutemen squad, who still seem to be working through the growing pains of a young team.

"The two weeks of hard practice might have caught up with us as a younger team, where it wouldn't so much with an older team who is more used to the work," coach Ken O'Brien said. "I didn't anticipate winning, but I thought we'd be closer than we were."

Carrara dropped 17 seconds off of the first meet of the season, cruising to his impressive 25:20 finish. The senior came in fifth with a time of 5:37 on September 20th in Boston. His strong leadership has continued on since early in the season, consistently placing first among Massachusetts runners.

"Ryan's a kid who, for the most part, we have basically made our living with," O'Brien said. "I was always impressed with his competitiveness. He puts his nose to the grindstone, and he knows what kind of a runner he wants to be, and he knows how to become that runner."

Freshman teammate Brendan Sullivan has also noticed the positive effect Carrara has on the team.

"He's definitely the leader," Sullivan said.

Sullivan, who surprised the opposition with a ninth place finish last week, fell to the 21st position this weekend. That, with the temporary loss of sophomore Peter Gleason, who was attending a wedding, hurt the Minutemen in Vermont.

"I didn't run well at all," Sullivan said. "I had some shin problems, but that's not an excuse."

Like last week, the young team left the meet optimistic, despite a less than impressive performance. Solid outings by sophomore Kevin Somers (11th place), senior Brian Chabot (16th), and freshman Thomas Stuart (28th), gave the team several points from which to build as the year goes on.

"I think everybody's going to get a lot better as the season goes on," Sullivan said. "Once we all run like we can, we'll do better than we did this weekend. We'll be a whole different team."

Minutemen tennis travels to URI; face uphill A–10 battle

By Aaron M. Soykin
Collegian Correspondent

Coming off a 16–2 season in 1996, and with the return of the entire squad this fall, the Massachusetts men's tennis team was confronted by great expectations at the start of its 1997 campaign.

But, only one game into the season, they find themselves as the underdog in their match today at the University of Rhode Island.

Already without the services of No. 5 singles player Bo Navarro, who will concentrate on academics this fall, and No. 4 player Alex Aller, who needs more preparation time, the Minutemen will open Atlantic 10 Conference play at a considerable disadvantage.

"Given that we're missing two of our regular singles players," coach Judy Dixon said.

"I consider us the underdog. That's how I'm priming my team."

With Aller out of the line up against the Rams, freshman walk-on Jason Lin will fill the extra slot, in what coach Dixon feels will be a true test of her team's ability.

"URI always feels that we're the team to beat," Dixon said.

"We need to start well, if we don't want them to think that they can beat us."

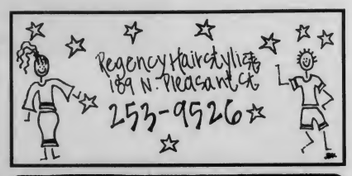
Much attention will be given to the No. 1 singles competition, where Minuteman Todd Cheney will try to avenge his 1996 loss to fellow Atlantic 10 All–Conference star Chris Bender.

Despite coming off an impressive 6–1 victory over Wesleyan in their opening match, Dixon believes that there is significant room for improvement as her team prepares to face an opponent eager for an opportunity to capitalize on any UMass misfortunes.

"The more hardships we've had to face, the better we've done," Dixon said. "Tuesday's match will be a real test."

Last week's opponent, Wesleyan College, will hopefully prove to be a solid tune–up for the Minutemen, who are looking to begin their march toward the top of the Atlantic 10 with a win today.

"I like to start our season out of the division so we can work our way into it," Dixon said.



"We have never lost to Wesleyan, but their program has been getting better and better."

With an upgraded schedule from that of a year ago, the Rams mark the first of many tests for the Minutemen in their season–long quest to match their female counterparts with a regional ranking.

three at–bats — he had two hits. He was serenaded by the sweet sounds from Harry Caray's raspy pipes. He was honored for being yet another Cubs legend that didn't get the chance to win a World Series.

Ryne brought power–hitting second sackers en vogue, and personified the term "consummate professional" during his hay–day as the All–Star second baseman in the senior circuit.

Sandberg most definitely deserved a better fate than spending his career with the Cubs.

• Hey all you Sox freaks out there...you know who you are. Break out the address book and the birthday cards 'cause Tony Fossas just turned 40 today. Yup, he's still alive! And, he still can't get righties out.

• Speaking of players, the Red Sox let go (today's column is all about segways), Jeff Bagwell has become the newest member of the 30–30 club.

I know what you're thinking, "We didn't let him go, we got Larry Anderson."

In swiping third base during a game this past weekend, Bagwell became the first full–time first baseman in major league history to hit 30 homers — he actually has an Astros' record 42 dingers — and steal 30 bases in a single season. Joe Carter joined the club while with the Indians, but split time between first base and left field.

How could the Sox have ever let Bagwell go?

I'll tell ya how.

He was drafted as a third baseman, and when he was traded in 1990, he was third on the depth chart in the organization behind some Wade Boggs guy, and two–time All–Star (and honorary Hideki Irabu Award winner) Scott Cooper, who was supposed to be a legitimate All–Star.

At the time, Lou Gorman had no good reason to switch Bagwell (a legitimate All–Star) to first base because he had Mo (Money, Mo' Problems) Vaughn waiting in the wings.

The Sox, as always, needed bullpen help, and Anderson did a fantastic job, but the Beantown boys got bumped from the playoffs by Oakland. The trade made sense — amazingly enough — because everybody thought Mo (a legit All–Star, too) would be a lifetime Red Sox...

Joseph J. Morrone Stadium (background) has been home for No.7 UConn's Jennifer (left) and Margaret Tietjen, but they will travel to Amherst today at 3:30 pm for a important regional match against No. 10 UMass.

"We've grown up together, so we know each other, how we're going to feel, and the honesty comes in. I know when to say something, and when not to say something.

"A lot of people come on their own to college, and I came with my sister. So, it's added another dimension to the field, and I know her style of play."

A similarity UConn would not like to share with UMass is the fact they need to replace some big holes in their lineup themselves. The Minutewomen lost six seniors to graduation, with the experience of many games such as this one under their belt, but the Huskies have lost vital leadership as well.

With the graduation of their No. 2 and 3 all–time leading scorers, Kerry Connors and Ginny Woodward respectively, and the early retirement of offensive sparkplug Jana Carabino, the Huskies — like UMass — have had to reassemble their lineup with young talent. In fact, Tsantiris has already done that, with their top two scorers in freshman forward Jen Carlson (7 goals, 2 assists, 16 points) and junior transfer Carmie Landeen (6–3–15).

It is like looking in the mirror, as the Minutewomen have freshman forward Kara Green (4–7–15), and junior transfer Sophie Lecot (6–0–12) as their top two scorers.

"A little has changed with their team, and a lot has changed with our team," Rudy said. "So, you basically can throw the past out the window. The players are always the factors in our games, but it might be different this time. Potential–wise, this might be their best team."

The trend is scary, and so would another loss be to the Tietjens. After a mistake against Hartford, they do not want to make another one like that for the rest of the season.

"I think we have a positive outlook for the rest of the season, and everybody knows what we need to do now," Margaret said. "We already lost to Hartford, so that's a good thing to fight for now, instead of having it handed to us.

"I think that this gives us an extra edge in fighting for the ball. We have to win every game, and come on strong."

For Jennifer, the road to NCAA success leads through UMass, and vice versa, and that road will begin today.

"In the last two years, we always seem to meet UMass in the final 16," Jennifer said. "So, when we play them in regional matches, we're like, 'Let's beat them now,' so we can have an extra edge on them in the tournament. It should be a closer match, because we have a lot of new players.

"It's going to be interesting."

No. 11 UM flying high; Hartford Hawks next stop

By Matthew J. Perrault
Collegian Staff

Tough schedules can make a season seem very long in defeat, or put the spotlight on you — if you are victorious.

The Massachusetts men's soccer team (4–0–1) has played four straight overtime games against the strongest opponents in the Eastern region, with two coming against nationally ranked squads (then–No. 9 Boston University and then–No. 22 New Hampshire).

In the end, their record in those games is an impressive 3–0–1, with a 2–1 upset over BU happening just last Saturday at Totman Field.

Men's Soccer
No. 11 Massachusetts vs. Hartford
@ Hartford

Next up for UMass, the NCAA semifinalist of a year ago, the Hartford Hawks in Hartford at 7:30 p.m. tonight.

The only blemish on the Minutemen's record this year is a 1–1 tie against Siena College. But since that game, UMass has reeled off three straight victories, while looking for four before the start of their Atlantic 10 schedule next week.

Senior forward Mike Butler sent both Maine and BU home with a loss with his overtime heroics, and senior forward Joenal Castma netted the game winner against UNH. Lately, UMass has been playing extremely well as a team, and is coming through at the most important time — crunch time.

UMass will try not to look at the polls, and therefore, get overconfident. Still, coach Sam Koch realizes there could be a letdown after the big win over BU.

"We have not played very well against Hartford, and we lost to them 1–0 last year," Koch said. "We have played some very tough games [this year], and mentally, this game is going to be very tough. We start the A–10 schedule right after this."

Hartford last year went all the way to the NCAA semi–finals, but will throw a different unit at the Minutemen this year. For Koch, if the Minutemen play to their ability, they should be successful.

"Hartford is a completely different team," Koch said. "I am more worried about how we play than how Hartford will. Its hard to come off such an emotional win against BU, and be ready for this game."

After the Hartford game, the A–10 schedule for UMass begins at St. Bonaventure this Friday, and at Duquesne this Sunday. Koch knows that winning your league is the first step towards anything bigger.

"You take care of your own business in the league and you have control over what happens," Koch said. "That is why the conference is so important and fair."

The Minutemen are playing big time teams and winning. At press time, the rankings had UMass cracking the Top 25 at No. 11. This is the first national ranking for the Minutemen since the beginning of last season, helped by their two straight wins over ranked opponents.

"We can't rely on what some poll says about how we play," Koch said. But the Minutemen are focused on making people the country take notice, and the spotlight is starting to warm up.

UMass–UConn rivalry returns to Pioneer Valley

The No. 7 Huskies will be led by their midfield one–two combination; the Tietjen sisters

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

STORRS, Conn. — A somewhat wise man once said that if you hate dark blue, you will never own a Husky, and you will never, ever send your kids to a farm school in the sticks — while attending the University of Massachusetts — then you possess the essence of the rivalry with Connecticut.

Disregarding the fact that UMass is also a farm school in the sticks, one of the most heated editions of this rivalry resumes this afternoon at 3:30 p.m. at Totman Field. The No. 7 Connecticut women's soccer team will travel the hour and a half north for an important regional match against the No. 1 0 Minutewomen (6–0).

Womens Soccer
No. 10 UMass vs. No. 7 UConn
@ Totman Field

Being the pseudo–farm school, the campus of UConn is similar, if not better in some respects, compared to UMass. However, the area around Storrs itself does not help, as the low drone of moo–ing mixes with the slow, unerring swish of time falling into oblivion (i.e. northeastern Connecticut).

At least, Amherst has Northampton as an escape zone.

On the surface, nothing is outstanding, but au contraire, mon frere.

UConn (4–1) will be led by a duo outstanding in their own right. Junior midfielders Jennifer and Margaret Tietjen are not just a duo, and not only sisters — but twins. The sisters Tietjen have helped propel the UConn program to the top of the nation, but now face another test in a season already complete with a number of tests.

After an early season 3–2 home loss to Hartford at Joseph J. Morrone Stadium, the Huskies have had to deal with a drop in the rankings. Now, the test continues, with UMass providing a young, speedy counterattack to UConn's recent success in this rivalry (5–0 since 1994).

"I think over the past few years we've had the upper hand in the rivalry, but since my freshman year, its always been about UMass," Margaret said, who was a 1996 All–Big East and All–Northeast Region second team selection. "We're expecting more of a running game, because young players are not always up on the physical side yet.

"That's what our freshman year was like, and we got used to the quickness of the game first. They lost a lot of players, so it'll be interesting because they're always a tough team."

In recent years, the matches between the two rivals have almost been divinely intervened. From cold winds to rain that would make Noah squirm, each match between UMass and UConn invokes the wrath of some higher power.

For Jennifer, the weather mirrors the spirit of the rivalry.

"It's always a battle, and there is one thing I've always said, 'When we play UMass, there's always weather problems,' Jennifer said, who also is a member of the 1996 Big East and Northeast region second team. "I remember going up to UMass our freshman year and it was a torrential downpour, and when we play them here, it's either rainy or muddy. We know what we're going to face. UMass is going to get up for us, and we're going to get up for them."

The Tietjens are just two of the factors the UMass coaching staff, coach Jim Rudy and assistant and former Minutewoman Rachel LeDuc, have to deal with in their preparation for the Huskies, but they are big ones. Credit is given to what they supply to UConn, but they still play for UConn, and Rudy would love nothing more than a win.

"They're big kids, who are speedy and have a attacking mentality," Rudy said. "They're great at their shooting, servicing and heading, and all those factors make them very dangerous. I hate what they do to us, but I love to watch them play as well.

"I always love to face my friend Lenny [UConn coach Len Tsantiris], and go head to head. I really respect UConn, and their soccer tradition, but believe me, I like to beat them much more."

COURTESY CONNECTICUT ATHLETIC COMMUNICATIONS

UMass senior defender Erica Iverson battles for the ball with UConn junior midfielder Margaret Tietjen in the 1995 Sweet Sixteen match in Storrs, Conn.

"UConn–UMass is always a good fight, no matter where it is played," LeDuc said, who scored the game–winning goal in UMass' 1–0 win over UConn in 1993. "Talent goes a long way, but against UConn, heart has a lot to do with it, and our players need to play with a lot of heart.

"You can't look at them as a better team or else you're going to feel less than them, and you can't do that going into any match."

Even though Jennifer and Margaret are exactly what they are — identical twins — the two still have their own personalities. In talking to them for the briefest of times the differences are sublime, but recognizable.

The competitive spirit of Jennifer shines through, with her voice rising when the mere mention of "the game" itself is uttered; while Margaret speaks in softer tones, making the impression what she says is more important than how she says it. Yet, with any "soulmate," the connection of having someone in your life almost exactly like you is evident, and for Margaret, it is hard to put into words.

"We're best friends, and we live together, and we're always together," Margaret said. "Playing soccer with each other, and having someone out there knowing you've been with them your whole life, and knowing what they're going to do is just...

"I mean, we're competitive, but on the other hand, we help each other because we can be honest with each other. Sometimes, you say the same thing, or I know what she's thinking, because I know her."

Since they were born on July 14, 1977, they have not known any other way but their way, and Jennifer could not see their situation in any other way, shape or fashion.

"I don't know how it is not to have a soulmate," Jennifer said.

McGwire is the Eve of Foundation

Fred Hurlbrink, Jr.

Major League Baseball

The imposing, finely–chiseled, statue–figure of Mark McGwire leveling his weapon in the batter's box strikes fear in the heart of any man who dares climb the hill which lies a mere 60 feet, six inches away.

A man with such prodigious strength, he need not even make contact with the tightly wound object hurled in his direction to make an impact on the outcome — he intimidates with his glare, and threatens with his power.

He wrecks baseballs, shatters prides and shortens careers, yet he is as genuine and caring a soul as has ever swung a Louisville Slugger.

In the age of inflated wages and egos, McGwire has truly proven to be a man among men in a sport meant for boys.

Not only did he sign a contract during the season — a tactic considered taboo by the too–powerful Player's Union — but he signed it after being traded mid–season, and for far less cash than he would have seen in the frenzy of off– season free agency.

McGwire will make $28.5 million over the next three seasons in St. Louis — not chump change, but not exactly market value these days. He probably would have attracted a free–agent contract in the vicinity of four years, $50 million.

All these acts are especially rare in baseball where contract negotiations are normally as ugly and drawn out as a UMass football game.

But most rare of all the aspects of the slugger's contract is a stipulation that accords a million dollars a year to the newly founded Mark McGwire Foundation.

The superstar first baseman started this organization to help children who have experienced the horrifying pain of physical and sexual abuse.

"Big Red," one of the most daunting presences in the game, could not contain his emotions when he announced that particular element of his contract. The most feared power hitter in the league broke down and wept.

McGwire's ability to send a baseball into the stratosphere is remarkable in its own right, but his ability to remain human in an industry that creates so many monsters is what inevitably in history will set him apart from the other stars of his baseball generation.

Minutemen need a minute to breathe after loss to Brown

By Fred Hurlbrink, Jr.

It usually doesn't happen like this.

For the Massachusetts men's water polo team, the first few matches of the season are often the most difficult — tired legs, stupid penalties and sloppy team play.

Not this season.

The Minutemen had a spectacular start, winning their first seven matches of the season. They beat four ranked teams in the first weekend of the season, including regional nemesis Navy for the first time ever in the regular season.

But now, three weeks into the season, UMass coach Russ Yarworth and his charges have a losing streak on their hands.

After dropping a tightly–contested home game to budding rival Queens College last Saturday, 8–5, UMass lost its second consecutive game to a non–Californian opponent for the first time since 1992, when they were beaten by Navy and Slippery Rock in the Eastern Championships.

UMass	6

Brown University was the benefactor of a shaky and sluggish Minuteman squad this weekend as they beat UMass, 10–6 in Providence.

"It's a case of us being the biggest game on everyone's schedule," Yarworth, whose team fell to 7–2 said. "The Brown kids were throwing each other in the pool after the game. The fans were jumping in the pool."

The Bears took a commanding 3–0 lead after the first period and held junior star Brian Stahl to just two goals in the game.

"Brian's working hard to become the best player he can be," Yarworth said of his star, who has scored only two goals in the last two games. He was ejected in the second half of the Queens loss for arguing with a referee.

Aldo Roman, who continues to shine at both ends of the pool also tallied a pair of scores in the match. The Bears defense allowed only four Minutemen to find the back of the net, holding UMass to their second consecutive single–digit goal total.

Co–captain J.C. Limardo and freshman Pedro Perez scored the other goals for UMass.

Sophomore Richard Huntley was peppered by the Brown offense with 22 shots on net. Yarworth said that he was pleased with his young goalkeeper's performance, but the team defense left something to be desired.

Also lacking in the loss was a consistent counterattack, and the Minutemen weren't able to get much going in the fast break offense — teams are finding ways of keeping the ball away from Stahl when he sets up down low.

A good amount of responsibility in the counterattack offense is on the goalie, who generally starts the fast break with a long pass. Huntley has the ability and the capacity to improve on this aspect of his game, and he will need to in order to get the UMass offense back in gear.

Take two for the Minutewomen; Drennan helps set two A–10 wins

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Correspondent

After a tough road trip that pitted the Massachusetts volleyball team against three top 20 teams, including top– ranked Penn State, coming back to Amherst had to be a relief. However, with the Atlantic 10 Conference season starting on Friday night, there was no time to slack off.

This weekend, in front of a substantial crowd at the Curry Hicks Cage, the Minutewomen upped their record to 6–5 with a 3–1 victory over the Xavier Musketeers on Saturday, and an exhilarating 3–2 win over Dayton on Friday.

Xavier	1

Saturday's match didn't go quite as well as coach Bonnie Kenny had hoped for. UMass upended Xavier in four games, 15–3, 13–15, 15–7, 15–6, but Kenny wasn't satisfied with the way her team attacked the net.

"The offensive part of our game bothered me, but a win's a win," Kenny said. "I'll take it any way we can get it. Kari [Hogancamp] played great for us, both offensively and defensively."

Hogancamp, who coming into the weekend ranked third in the country in digs, led the way with a 19 kill–14 dig performance, and senior Lesley Nolan chipped in with 12 kills and 21 digs. Hogancamp's 19 kills was a career–high.

UMass struggled early on in the first game, but then ran off 12 unanswered points to take it handily. After dropping game two, the Minutewomen had their way with the Musketeers. Every time Xavier had crawled back to striking distance in the last two games, UMass had a streak of their own to put it out of reach.

In the Atlantic 10 opener Friday against Dayton, sophomore Jill Meyers was the highlight of the match, collecting a career–high 34 kills, leading the team on their way to an all–time single match record of 98 kills. But, it was barely enough as Dayton hung tough, extending the match to five games. With a strong performance in the fifth set by Nolan, the Minutewomen added one into the win column with a 15–5, 13–15, 15–13, 13–15, 15–10 victory.

"This is the best offensive performance we've had in a long time," Kenny said. "Jill Meyers had a great night on the attack. We should have capitalized on more opportunities, but I'm still extremely happy with the win."

It was a record–setting night for another Minutewoman on Friday. Freshman setter Jennifer Drennan set a UMass single–match record with 83 assists, breaking the old mark of 78 set by Katie Pearce in 1995. Nolan had a season–high 26 kills while sophomores Sarah Watter and Hogancamp had 17 and 11 kills, respectively.

"Our passing was excellent, Jenny did a great job," Kenny said. "Our ball control and defense won the match for us."

The Minutewomen are back in action on Friday, when they go on the road to take on St. Bonaventure.

Northeastern takes '96 NCAA field hockey rematch

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

BROOKLINE — It was a hard fought contest. Steely defenses shutting down offensive attacks, sweat–soaked opponents battling for every loose ball.

It was the type of match–up the fans wanted to see.

Unfortunately for the Massachusetts field hockey team, it was only the second half of Saturday's 3–0 loss to Northeastern (3–2) that played out this way.

"Had we competed the way we did in the second half, it would've been a totally different game," UMass coach Patty Shea said.

UMass (3–4) though, had trouble getting settled in the first half, and went into the break down, 3–0.

"They were a little hesitant in the beginning, and it came back to hurt them," Shea said. "You can't dig yourself a hole like that against a team like this."

So at halftime, Shea decided to mix things up. Michelle Crooks got the nod in goal, replacing starter Zowie Tucker. The team also switched its field positioning about five minutes into the period.

"We needed to be more disciplined and stay within the game plan," Shea said. "So after five minutes we decided to change our line–up a little. We pushed some people up and did some other things."

Shea also called on her team to put together a cohesive effort.

"I told them I didn't care what the score was, but I needed to see this team compete together," she said.

In the second half, the Minutewomen did just that — the teams locked horns in a scoreless battle, in which serious advances on opposing goalies were limited.

"If you arrived at halftime and there wasn't a scoreboard, you never would have guessed what the final score was," Shea said.

Northeastern's win was the reward for Jen White's efforts. The senior forward, who scored twice, was NU's clear–cut offensive force on the afternoon. White put the first tally on the board with 26:03 left in the period by taking the ball up the left sideline, cutting in to the middle of the field and firing a shot from seven yards out past Tucker.

She upped the Husky advantage to 2–0 with just under 17 minutes remaining before halftime. White collected the ball in the circle after a NU free hit, and redirected the ball into the UMass cage. NU pocketed its final goal of the afternoon with under a minute on the clock before intermission on a penalty corner play.

"[White] and Kerri Bettenhauser are probably their two most dangerous players," Shea said. "We knew that going in. And we had a freshman on her, but that's what we had to do. It was baptism by fire."

Now, the Minutewomen have to put this loss behind them, as the conference schedule looms in the very near future. Rhode Island visits Richard F. Garber Field tomorrow for UMass' Atlantic 10 opener.

"They have to forget about this one," Shea said. "URI is a conference game and your conference is always very important. It's always takes a lot of your focus. You play your other opponents for your strength of schedule."

Officials continue evacuation of Montserrat

SALEM, Montserrat (AP) — Trying to force scores of residents to evacuate from volcano–threatened areas, officials said Monday they are prepared to shut off water and power to several villages on this Caribbean island.

Disaster workers in this British colony evacuated 80 people late Sunday from the villages of Old Towne, Frith's and Olveston after an eruption of searing gas and rock ignited the abandoned airport 3 1/2 miles northeast of the volcano. The towns lie the same distance northwest of the smoldering Soufriere Hills volcano.

On Monday, another eruption sent volcanic material to within half a mile of the evacuated towns, and scientists warned future avalanches could decimate the area before plunging into the sea..

The government hoped to evacuate the remaining 50 people from the villages and about 100 people in the larger town of Salem by Saturday, said Richard Aspin of Montserrat's Emergency Operations Center. Then the government plans to cut water, power and telephone service to the area and set up locking barriers across the only access road, he said. month," said Aspin.

50 volunteers to be injected with live HIV

CHICAGO (AP) — A group of doctors and public health advocates say AIDS research is so important that they are willing to risk their lives by being the first humans to be injected with a vaccine consisting of a live, though weakened, strain of HIV.

The International Association of Physicians in AIDS Care, based in Chicago, wants to conduct the test involving about 50 volunteers. Gordon Nary, executive director of the Chicago group and one of the trial's volunteers, said the risks of being in the study are diminished by what can be learned from it.

AIDS vaccine development is a slow process because of the safety measures and rigorous animal testing needed before injecting humans with a trial vaccine.

"Vaccine development has really dragged on because there is an assumption by conservative scientists that people won't step up and do this," Nary said.

AIDS research efforts have focused on vaccines that do not involve a live virus because of fear that even a weakened, live human immunodiciency virus strain might be capable of causing AIDS or other problems.

Dr. Mark Grabowsky of the National Institute of Allergy and Infectious Diseases is skeptical of the proposed study and says it's premature to talk about injecting healthy people with a live vaccine.

Students protest the Red Cross; claim homophobic discrimination

Protesters discuss their views with a Red Cross representative in the Campus Center Yesterday.

By Rachael Pepe and Laura Stock
Collegian Staff

Approximately 75 to 100 students gathered at the American Red Cross blood drive in the University of Massachusetts Campus Center yesterday afternoon to protest what they claim is homophobic discrimination in donor screening.

The demonstration was in response to the Red Cross not accepting the blood of men who have slept with other men since 1977, said protest organizer Jesse Birchfield, a 24–year–old legal studies major.

"People already have the myth that we [gay or bisexual men] all have AIDS," Birchfield said, "and we will end that myth today."

The protest took place at noon, with students marching from the Lesbian, Bisexual, Gay Alliance (LBGA) office in the Student Union to Campus Center Concourse, and the room where blood was being taken by the Red Cross.

Chanting, "Two, four, six, eight — gay blood is as good as straight," and "Hey hey, ho ho, homophobia has got to go," protestors followed Red Cross representatives to their table in the concourse.

Students then split up and went to both entrances of the Campus Center to continue to hand out flyers and let others know what was going on.

"We want to stop the American Red Cross from discriminating against us," Birchfield said. "Everytime they show up here, we'll be here."

The questions on the Blood Donation Record (BDR) — a health history questionnaire administered to potential donors — that prompted the protest read, "For males: have you had sex, even once, with another male since 1977," and "For females: in the last 12 months, have you had sex, even once, with a male who has had sex with another male since 1977?"

While the Red Cross administers this questionnaire, they

SGA elections to be held; Today's ballots include six new referendum questions

By Victoria Groves

The Student Government Association (SGA) will be running elections today to elect senators for the 1997–1998 academic year.

There are 75 senate seats available and each senator represents 250 students as their constituents. Those residential buildings with less are represented by "at large" senators. Voters may vote for one candidate running to represent their building if one exists, and one "at large" candidate.

Elections Chancellor Jodi Bailey has worked with the candidates through the nomination process and is in charge of the elections.

"Senators are a liaison between the student government and the student body. They represent their constituents' feelings and bring their thoughts and problems to the SGA so they can be dealt with," Bailey said.

The ballot will also contain six referendum questions submitted by student trustee Brian Tirrell and SGA president Lia Wong.

"When I wrote my questions, I used whatever issue I thought students need to have a strong voice about. I feel students need to be discussing and thinking about these issues," Tirrell said.

Tirrell has submitted two questions:

1. Do you want video cameras in the lobbies of residence halls?

2. Do you support students being able to have legal council (lawyers) to defend them in university judicial hearings that my result in eviction, suspension or expulsion?

Ballot questions to affect students

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

Today's Student Government Association (SGA) elections offer students the chance to make their voices heard not only concerning who will represent their interests within the student senate, but also by voting on six referendum questions.

Referendum questions are a prime opportunity for our student leaders to find out how their constituency feels on issues affecting everyone on campus.

News Analysis

An example of this would be the questions submitted by Brian Tirrell, student trustee, whose two questions concern students rights and representation.

Tirrell's first question involves the addition of video cameras in residence halls, which will directly affect student dorm life. His second question, which would allow students to have legal council in university judicial hearings may permit students to better represented when faced with the possibility of eviction, suspension or expulsion.

In celebration of 25 years of women's activism at the University of Massachusetts, the Women's Studies Program, the Everywoman's Center, and the Faculty Senate Council on the Status of Women have planned the Women's Activism Reunion, which will take place from Sept. 25 to 28.

During the past quarter century, the Everywoman's Center, Women's Studies Program and the Faculty Senate Council on the Status of Women have joined forces to create opportunities for women, preserve the environment and address a wide range of social problems on and off campus. These three sister organizations have been working for the past year and a half to incorporate a reunion consisting of faculty, alumni, staff and students.

The women activists have not had a reunion such as this for 15 years. They had a tenth year reunion but, since then, the department has grown considerably. This reunion will give the Women's Studies Department a chance to spread their knowledge, interests and new opportunities to students and the community.

Arlene Avakian, a professeur, author and one of the founders of the Everywoman's Center, has been with this department since the early '70s. At that time she was a graduate student here at UMass. She has been with the department through its growth from the hallway in Goodell to the widespread women's activists centers on campus.

"This is exciting because since the tenth reunion, all the woman's activists have joined together as one to create this reunion," said Karen Lederer, a member of the UMass Women's Studies Department. "I am excited to see alumnus of the program, old college friends and fellow activists."

Lederer is an alum and has been with the department for almost 11 years. She continues her health and safety activities with her Union, SEIU Local 509 and her service as a Chapter Board member.

Ann Ferguson, Director of the Women's Studies Department and a member of the Faculty Senate on the Council of Women, said that she is also excited about the upcoming reunion events.

Identities of suicide bombers revealed

By Samar Assad
Associated Press

ASSIRA, West Bank — At least three of five suicide bombers who carried out recent attacks in Jerusalem were on a list of Islamic militants Israel had pressed Yasser Arafat's government to arrest, Israel announced yesterday.

The three bombers were among 88 Hamas and Islamic Jihad activists that Israeli authorities demanded the Palestinian Authority arrest to try to prevent more suicide bombings. All three lived in the West Bank village of Assira, a Hamas stronghold. A Palestinian security official said the three, along with a fourth Hamas activist from Assira, were cell mates in a Palestinian jail in the West Bank town of Nablus for six months in 1996. They were allowed daily furloughs and disappeared after failing to return from one in September 1996.

The disclosure was likely to embarrass Arafat, who has insisted that the suicide bombers responsible for the July 30 and Sept. 4 attacks in Jerusalem came from abroad.

Nevertheless, Palestinian officials said today that Arafat's government could not be blamed for failing to prevent the bombings because Israel was in charge of security in Assira and all other West Bank villages. The Palestinian Authority controls security only in the seven West Bank towns.

"They (the bombers) acted and worked under the nose of Benjamin Netanyahu," Arafat adviser Ahmed Tibi said of the suspects' activities in Assira. Security there "was his responsibility." However, Israel's military intelligence chief said the suicide bombers received their instructions from Hamas ringleaders operating from areas under full Palestinian control and out of reach for Israeli security forces.

Israel identified the suicide bombers from Assira as Moawiya Jarara, 22; Bashar Salawah, 23; and Tawfiq Yassin, 25. A possible fourth suspect was still under investigation.

Relatives said the four boyhood friends had surrendered to Palestinian police in Nablus in March 1996, when Arafat was rounding up hundreds of Hamas activists in response to four earlier Hamas suicide bombings in Israel.

The four knew they were wanted by Israel and believed they would be safer in Palestinian custody. They ended up in a cell together in a Nablus jail, where, according to a Palestinian security official, security was lax and inmates were allowed frequent visits outside prison. In September 1996, the four did not return from one such outing and had been on the run from Palestinian and Israeli security forces since then.

The official, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the wardens at the Nablus jail were later reprimanded by their superiors for letting the four get away.

The Israeli statement said the four Hamas activists from Assira had been on Israel's wanted list for a December 1995 shooting near Nablus in which an army doctor and a soldier were injured. After the four walked out of the Nablus jail, Israel demanded that the Palestinian Authority rearrest them amid concerns they would carry out more attacks. The four were also on the list of 88 names of Hamas and Islamic Jihad activists Israel wanted the Palestinian Authority to arrest after the two Jerusalem bombings, the statement said.

The final four questions were submitted by Lia Wong, SGA president. These questions involve the wording of the SGA Constitution which may eventually affect students, but the questions seem to be mostly made up of technicalities. Students will not be directly affected by whether Title VII of the Constitution states "ninety (90) days" or "ninety (90) calendar days," which is the premise of one of Wong's questions.

With the numerous protests that have taken place at UMass within the past year, it can be said that many students have strong opinions on issues of rights and representation. This is not an apathetic campus. Why then, aren't all the referendum questions concerning student issues? Being a student run organization that considers itself representative of the students, the SGA leader should jump at the rare opportunity to get an opinion straight from the students themselves.

Last year the SGA was known for its bi-partisan bickering and inability to focus on the big picture — their constituents. With new leadership and a brand new year ahead, the SGA should try to change their image and really affect the lives of students. Tirrell seems to be making positive steps towards this goal, while from the looks of the ballot, Wong is not.

By using this election to clean up wording in the Constitution, the SGA is conveying the notion that the issues that affect students are not the same ones the SGA are working on.

The reunion's atmosphere is an informal event geared towards not only the department but the community as well. There are educational, entertaining, and children's programs throughout the four days.

The program could not have come about without the volunteer efforts of alumni, staff, faculty and the community who were part of the reunion planning committee, according to Feruson.

Also, the following organizations helped to contribute to this historical weekend: UMass Graduate School; UMass Women's Studies Department; Lois E. Toko & the Class of 1956 Lecture Series; Chancellor's Office; Dean, College of Humanities and Fine Arts; Mount Holyoke Women's Studies; Amherst College Woman and Gender Studies; Hampshire College Feminist Studies; Smith College; Five Colleges, Inc.; American Express.

The reunion is being held Sept. 25–28. There is a registration fee for the entire reunion and charges for some of the events. Call Michele in the Alumni Office at (413)545-2317 or (800) 456-UMASS for more information. Also, the complete schedule of events will appear on the Women's Issues page of the Collegian tomorrow.

Clinton warns Congress he will call a special session to pass campaign rules

By Carolyn Skorneck
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Clinton threatened yesterday to call the Senate into a special session to consider a proposed overhaul of campaign finance rules if Republican leaders try to go home for the year without making time for debate and a vote.

"This measure is of the utmost importance, and it deserves full consideration on the Senate floor," Clinton wrote to Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott of Mississippi.

The president, whose own fund-raising activities are under investigation, warned, "If any attempt is made to bring this bill up in a manner that would preclude sufficient time for debate, I will call on Congress to stay in session until all of the critical elements are fully considered."

With the Clinton threat in hand, Senate Minority Leader Tom Daschle of South Dakota agreed to support the same Lott resolution he angrily rejected Friday. It calls for the Senate to debate a bill co-sponsored by Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Russ Feingold, D-Wis., before the Senate adjourns for the year and blocks any attempt to bring up campaign finance overhaul legislation before that bill is considered.

"The concern we had (Friday) was that the bill would be offered at the very last day or in the last week, leaving us virtually no opportunity to debate campaign finance reform in a meaningful way," Daschle told reporters. "With the assurance that we now have in this letter, that the president is willing to invoke his authority under Article 2, Section 3 of the Constitution, that fear is no longer a real one."

If the bill is brought up the day the Senate wants to recess, Clinton can simply extend the session, he said.

Lott said on the Senate floor that he never intended to wait until the end of the session to bring up the bill. And after listing a number of presidential initiatives pending before Congress, he issued a warning of his own.

"The president has a lot of issues that he would like for us to work with him on," Lott said. "We intend to do that. We do not intend to be threatened or intimidated on this or any other issue."

Just getting the Senate to stay in town is not the answer, McCain said.

"We all know the president can call Congress into session all he wants to. He can't make them act," he told the Senate. Praising Lott's prior commitment to bring up the legislation, McCain said, "We don't need letters from the president of the United States," but serious bipartisan negotiation.

"The president is, in my view, playing this for political advantage," McCain said in an interview. "It could be harmful to the bipartisanship that has to be found on this issue."

The bill would, among other things, ban unlimited "soft money" donations to political parties. Such gifts, some worth hundreds of thousands of dollars, have generated screaming headlines this year and have led to a Justice Department investigation of fund raising by Clinton and Vice President Al Gore.

Talks begin for Northern Ireland's future

Session marks milestone in British and Irish relationship

BELFAST (AP) — Northern Ireland's main pro-British party faced the IRA's political allies for the first time in negotiations yesterday — but only long enough to demand that the Sinn Fein party be kicked out of the process.

Apparently harboring little hope of success, Ulster Unionist leader David Trimble was already talking about how his party would deal with Sinn Fein in the weeks ahead.

"We are not there to negotiate with Sinn Fein and there is no obligation for us to be present the whole time. We will negotiate with the government and other parties. We can pick and choose bilaterals," Trimble told reporters.

Nonetheless, the session marked a milestone in the long effort by the British and Irish governments to get all of Northern Ireland's parties to the table to negotiate a settlement acceptable to both Protestants and the Roman Catholic minority.

Northern Ireland Secretary Mo Mowlam, the senior British official in the province, must decide whether to accept or reject the unionist challenge. But the government has gone to great lengths to draw Sinn Fein into the process while also keeping the Ulster Unionists involved, and was delighted to get both parties in the same room yesterday.

"This afternoon we will have around the table loyalists, republicans, nationalists and unionists," Mowlam said before the rancorous meeting. "We aim to move forward towards substantive negotiations as soon as possible, and today is another step in that direction."

Sinn Fein was admitted to the talks this month after the Irish Republican Army called a cease-fire in July and later affirmed its commitment to nonviolence.

The Ulster Unionists contend the cease-fire was merely a tactical move, like a previous IRA cease-fire that lasted 17 months. The party's security spokesman, Ken Maginnis, accused Sinn Fein leaders of directing the IRA as well.

"We know that Gerry Adams and (his deputy) Martin McGuinness have been actively involved in the IRA's terrorist campaign since the beginning... as activists, as commanders and now as godfathers," Maginnis told reporters. "Let them deny what everyone knows and make greater liars of themselves than they already are."

Adams called the Ulster Unionist protest "a sham."

"This was hailed as the great showdown, the great challenge to Sinn Fein. But the leaders simply made their statement then scampered out of the room" during yesterday's meeting, Adams said. Trimble "didn't say anything and had he listened to what I had to say, I made the point that every section of our people have suffered and that none of us have a monopoly on suffering," Adams added.

McGuinness dismissed the Ulster Unionists' claim that Sinn Fein didn't have to be at the table.

"I think everybody acknowledges that if we are not in the talks then there is no prospect whatsoever of a settlement in this conflict," he said.

John Hume, leader of the Social Democratic and Labor Party, Sinn Fein's moderate rival for Catholic votes, said he believed Sinn Fein was genuinely committed to peace.

"We have got to the stage now where all the major parties are here. No one could have forecast that a few years ago," he said. "Now let's get down to sorting out our differences."

Although Adams and Trimble have never spoken, Ulster Unionist Party colleagues have sat down with Adams and other Sinn Fein leaders.

do not determine what questions appear on the document, according to Melissa Croteau, director of corporate communications for the New England Region of the American Red Cross.

"All questions on that form are asked because the FDA [Food and Drug Administration] demands it," Croteau said.

The Red Cross is licensed by the FDA to collect and maintain blood products, and must follow their regulations, Croteau said.

"I think if someone has a concern about questions, they should direct them to the FDA," Croteau said.

Protesting the questionnaire: Not a new issue

The controversy over whether questions regarding homosexual behavior should appear on the BDR is not a new issue, according to Croteau.

Not only did Amherst College students address the issue a year ago in a meeting with representatives from the Red Cross, the Red Cross itself has taken steps to inform the FDA of sentiments surrounding the questions.

Representatives from the entire North Atlantic Region, which includes the New England Region, brought their concerns to the American Association of Blood Banks (AABB) at a meeting last year. Because the FDA filed a consent-decree against the Red Cross regarding an unrelated issue, the Red Cross cannot approach the FDA directly to argue policy, Croteau said.

"We agree with students that it might be time for the FDA to review the questions," Croteau said.

According to Croteau, the FDA chose 1977 because that was the date H.I.V. was first found in the U.S. population, (in blood samples of men who practiced homosexual behavior), according to a study performed in the 1980s.

Croteau recommended students discuss their concerns with their legislatures, local representatives and senators, or contact the FDA directly.

A peaceful protest

Yesterday's demonstration was peaceful, and protesters did not attempt to impede any blood donations.

"I think [students] were very cognizant of the need for blood to be collected today, and didn't disrupt donations" Croteau said.

In fact, Croteau said the number of donations yesterday morning was higher than normal, and they had received 27 by 1 p.m. Their daily goal for UMass is 50 donations.

"We know that the Red Cross is in desperate need of blood," Donnie Roberts, a senior psychology major, said. "But by not accepting our blood, they are biting off their own arms."

The Red Cross has solicited blood donations at UMass for the past 10 years, this location being the largest in the region. According to Croteau, 25 percent of blood donors are college and high school students.

In addition to the health history questionnaire, the Red Cross screens all blood donations for AIDS, hepatitis and syphilis.

Following yesterday's protest, students broke up into groups and began to distribute flyers and stickers around various parts of campus.

Racism: a quest for the unearned

Despite its apparent widespread rejection, racism is rampant today. It is manifest in multiculturalism, hiring quotas, the diversity movement, and "apologies" for slavery. While these forms of racism are less visible and less shocking than the blatantly irrational Klan-style racism which has lost fashion, they are racism nonetheless. It makes no fundamental difference whether one condemns people for their race, or praises them for it — racism teaches that one's racial group is the primary source of one's identity, of one's thinking, of one's value.

Keith Didion

In the racist's view, an individual is unimportant. What is important is the group, the tribe, the race — to which the individual is to become subordinate.

In this way, racism is merely another variant of collectivism — the idea that an individual is nothing more than an interchangeable, and dispensable, unit of a larger whole. The whole in this case is not one's nation or economic class, but one's ancestors and ethnic group. The racial whole is deemed to be superior to — and of more value than any particular member. A black man, even though he may not even be able to afford tomorrow's dinner, is supposed to "feel a sense of justice" if some other black man, whom he doesn't even know, is given a job by a racial hiring quota. President Clinton's recent "apology" for slavery was directed not toward any particular people who were shafted by slavery, rather it was directed to the collective as such, to a disembodied aggregate, held in Clinton's mind as "the race." When the race is everything, the individual becomes nothing.

Racism, by granting that an individual's identity is defined by his color-group, assumes that an individual's ideas (and actions) are not the result of his choice, but rather the determined by-product of his racial make-up. Thus, we can't have truth, language or logic, but "Bosnian truth" vs. "Croatian truth;" or "black language" vs. "white language;" or "Jewish logic" vs. "Aryan logic." Racism holds that a person is not in control of his ideas or his actions, that he is an automation pushed and pulled by "black rage," "white guilt" or "Jewish greed," that he is impotent in regard to action, helpless in regard to thought.

Because it maintains that a person's conclusions are muddied by one's race, ("you don't understand — you're white."), racism holds that thought, as such, is useless. It is useless because we can only see, in effect, through race- colored glasses. We can never grasp facts as they really are, only facts filtered through ethnicity. Reason, the tool by which humans grasp the world, becomes a useless by- product. A person who chooses to submerge himself in his race, says in effect, "my mind by itself is futile, I need a group who will do my thinking for me." A person who seeks to denounce those of other races, says in effect "my mind by itself is futile, I must find an easy, non-rational way to judge others."

Racism is a substitute — a faulty one — for a person's exercising his own independent, rational judgement. It makes judging others not a scrupulously deliberative process of recalling facts and weighing relevant factors, but a kindergarten-level activity of distinguishing shades and hues. All racists, whether the old-fashioned bigot or the modern multiculturalist, seek to gain knowledge, without using the means of getting it. They seek cognition and evaluation — the effect, without reason — the cause.

Just as the racist seeks unearned knowledge, so he seeks unearned self-esteem. He wants to "feel good about himself," without doing anything to feel good about. He wants the pride of saying, "My race has accomplished a lot," without his having accomplished anything. He wants a feeling of superiority over others, not on the basis of actually being superior, but by arbitrarily asserting the inherent superiority of his group. By submerging his self into his race, by becoming merely an interchangeable member of a group, by denying the power of the human mind to know facts, by doing everything he can to lose his self, he seeks self-esteem. Such a person, however, has lost any self to be esteemed.

When one rejects reason, all one is left with is the irrational. The choice is either reason, along with independent judgement, individual achievement and true self-esteem — or racism, hatred, barbed wire and slave labor camps. There is no other alternative.

Lost and found

Seema Gangatirkar

I have just spent the last 20 minutes searching for my keys. I know they are somewhere... just not anywhere I'm looking. There are only about three places my keys could be and right now, my keys aren't in any of those places.

Enter kindly friend who asks, "Are you sure you checked everywhere?"

Of course I checked everywhere. But friend persists, saying, "Well, look again."

Just in case I missed it the first 38 million times, I suppose. At this point, I'm thinking about investing the $19.95 which will buy me one of those clap on/clap off dealn which will point me in the direction of my keys.

Anyway, my keys did turn up — in my pocket. Silly me. But you all know the frustration which builds when you've lost something.

There is something inherently mind-numbing and hysterical about looking for something you lost. For instance, suppose it's something as mundane as a sock. There is an irrational reason why you need that sock and only that sock and, until you find that sock, you know no rest.

Of course your friends pop by with the helpful hints.

"Did you check under the bed?" one will ask.

At this point, a withering glare can be thrown at the good Samaritan.

"How about in your dresser?"

At this point, you roll your eyes. Of course you checked in your dresser.

"Are you wearing the socks?"

Don't laugh, it has happened. Many people looking for their glasses discover them right on their face.

But the actual frustration level involved in a hunt for a lost object depends on how important the object is and how soon you need it to get on with your life.

There is a law out there — mathematically proven — that says the more important something is, the more likely it is you will lose it.

That's right. If it's that 80-page paper on the workings of the government in Micronesia that's due today in 13 minutes and is worth 75 percent of your semester grade, you can bet that the paper has mysteriously vanished. Or maybe it's that application to your dream job and it has to go in the mail, but now... you guessed it, it's lost.

There are things that get lost on their own without any help from you.

For example, take socks. When things get lost, socks are among the biggest culprits. Most people lose their socks during the spin rinse of the wash cycle. Others have their socks eaten by the monster lurking in the dryer. So then you have only one sock instead of two. And the next time you lose a sock, it's never the mate to the one you've already lost.

There are other things that get lost easily. IDs can never be found and wallets seem to disappear on a regular basis. Remote controls slip behind sofa cushions and mittens end up somewhere other than on your hands.

Now some of you can laugh and say you've never lost a thing in your life. Most of us who lose things on a hourly basis would laugh right back at you, for different reasons, of course. Just think about the valuable life skills you aren't learning right now. What if you lose something in the future? Will you ever be able to find it without the practice the rest of us have had?

The best part of losing something is finding the object again. The exhilaration of finding something once feared to be lost forever cannot be compared.

This is the time when you brandish the treasured object, and run around to show everyone who matters and even those who don't.

And during the little show-and-tell routine, this would be a good time to say you knew where it had been all the time — it was never really lost.

Yeah, right.

Facts needed in Cassini debate

To the Editor:

I fully encourage debate concerning the Cassini probe. However, debate should be informed. Much debate has consisted of people reacting to buzzwords without bothering to research the subject. Doctress Neutopia's letter to the editor is an example, and I will address some of her remarks.

Doctress: "72.3 pounds of plutonium, the deadliest substance known to humans."

Pu-238, the type of plutonium on board Cassini, is extremely deadly. If you inhaled a small amount in powdered form, you would die. However, you could hold a chunk of Pu-238 with an oven mitt and not suffer from the radiation. In fact, the oven mitt is to protect you from heat, not from radioactivity.

Doctress: "If the spacecraft was to blow up... much of the southeast coast would be polluted with radioactive fallout. Millions of people would die... and the land would be contaminated for thousands of generations..."

The canisters containing the Pu-238 are designed to withstand re-entry and extreme impacts. The containment system has undergone rigorous testing, and satisfies NASA and other agencies. Check out NASA's web page at www.nasa.gov, plus the web page for Florida Today (www.flatoday.com/space/explore/special/cassini.html).

Also, the plutonium is in ceramic form. This means that, under stress, the material is designed to break into chunks. This greatly reduces the chance that powder will be released (remember, plutonium must be inhaled to pose a real health hazard). Also, chunks are easier to clean up, and more likely to fail near the site of any accident.

Doctress: "NASA has sold its soul to the militarization and nuclearization of space."

NASA's mission is the exploration of space, and the development of technologies to that end. The only "militarization" I've seen NASA consider has been the ill-fated Strategic Defense Initiative during the Reagan years. As for "nuclearization", NASA has a strong tradition of using solar power. Witness the Mars Observer, the Viking Orbiters, and the Mariner missions. NASA turns to nuclear power only when solar power would be too inefficient, cumbersome, or fragile. Also, Cassini's power system operates neither by fission or fusion. The radioactive material acts as a heat source for a thermoelectric generator, and does not undergo any explosion or reaction. Cassini is not a potential nuclear bomb.

Doctress (quoting www.foxearth.com): "Military control of space... would depend upon the ability to use nuclear reactors... as a power source for [a variety of weapons]..."

If you wanted to take military control of space, wouldn't it make sense to launch actual weapons, instead of sending probes off to explore distant planets? First, you'd have faster feedback about whether the system works; second, you'd have the weapons in place.

Doctress: "Space... a new military high ground, not as a way of working to solve our pressing problems on earth, such as soil erosion, deforestation and world hunger."

Again, I recommend taking a look at www.nasa.gov. Check out NASA's "Mission to Planet Earth," which is concerned with these problems, plus pollution, ozone depletion, tracking forest fires, predicting floods, etc.

Finally, I urge all who are interested in the debate to research it. Ask professors, physics students, engineers, astronomers; surf the web; check out the Physical Sciences Library; read newspapers... in short, be informed! Whichever side of the issue you take, you will stand on firmer ground.

Civil rights violations

To the editor:

The Concerned Students for Civil Rights has organized the protest of The American Red Cross on campus due to the active discriminatory practices that they use on our campus. Although in desperate need of blood, The American Red Cross does not accept the blood of any man who has had sexual relations with another man or any woman who has had sex with a man who has had sex with a man since 1977. This outright rejection of blood is uncalled for. All blood donations have been screened for HIV since 1985.

This practice by the American Red Cross assumes and perpetuates the stereotype that all gay and bisexual men have AIDS. This assumption is incorrect. We should all know by now that AIDS is not a gay disease.

We understand that the policy of discrimination is one that is set by the U.S. Food and Drug administration. People have asked "why protest the Red Cross for a policy that it did not create?" The answer is two-fold. First, students at UMass do not have physical access to the FDA; We do, however, have access to The American Red Cross. Secondly, the FDA is not on our campus turning away gay and bisexual men; The American Red Cross is. We ultimately believe that if The American Red Cross stood up to the FDA, the policy would be changed.

We are asking all RSOs, fraternities, sororities and other campus groups to join us in standing up to the discriminatory practices of The American Red Cross by not sponsoring blood drives. We are also asking members of the campus community to support us by refraining from donating blood until The American Red Cross changes its discriminatory practices.

To the editor:

Let us reflect on our actions on this day and of those before. Who of us came out to defend what we believe or support those who made the initiative to do so? Who of us stood on the side lines and watched? Who of us could stand by and let the whole mess wash over? Let us remember that issues we do not address now do have the tendency to bite us at a later date. Let's stop this cycle and act now.

I am in full support of the Concerned Students for Civil Rights in their strive to end the discrimination against gay and bisexual men of our society on the part by The American Red Cross. There are at least two basic civil rights being violated: discrimination on the basis of gender and discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation. This is illegal. This is intolerable and unacceptable under any circumstances and from anyone, from any organization.

I ask that we put our biases aside to end this together. Let all our voices be heard. I am in favor of open dialogue among all parties involved to come up with a solution to this impeding issue. The American Red Cross, the Food and Drug Administration, the students of this campus and people across the country, let us address this issue now! Let us not allow stereotypes and misconceptions set us back!

I am and always will support any who deems it necessary to uphold and advocate for our basic civil rights.

Racial domination?

How amusing for Daniel Bodah to regale impressionable students with his tale of "millions of racist whites that dominate the power structures and the terms of democracy in the world at large" including the enlightened liberal environs off Amherst, no less!

Does Bodah suppose that the Clinton cabinet is filled with vicious racist Klansmen — smuggled in from the Ozarks, perhaps?

Does Bodah imagine that the boardrooms of American corporations are filled with neo-Nazi skinheads, sitting around plotting new strategies to oppress and exploit "darkies," "wetbacks," "slopes" and "kikes"?

Despite their many "millions," it is yet amazing to learn from Bodah that these powerful racist whites are able to dominate the entire "world at large," especially when one considers that white people constitute only 8 percent of the world, would almost be tempted to suppose that such a powerful, dominating race must somehow be — one hesitates to use the word — "superior" to other races.

If Bodah was attempting to make an argument for white superiority, no doubt he will have the hearty support of those legions of white racists he claims are running the show in Amherst.

On the other hand, Bodah's theory of white racist domination fails to explain why the Japanese, Koreans and Chinese are now kicking butt in international trade. Is that a fiendishly deceptive part of the white racist plot, or did somebody decide that Asians were actually white and forget to tell us about it? Dang, and here I was thinking we were still in the business of oppressing Asians, too. Looks like someone at White Domination Inc.'s world headquarters slipped up on their paperwork. At any rate, I just thought I'd take a minute to share these thoughts with many white racist comrades in Amherst. Right now I've got to get back to my day job, dominating "the world at large." Funny thing, but you'd think such an important job would pay more than $10 an hour, huh?

New Lost Boyz release lacks spark

COURTESY UNIVERSAL RECORDS

Lost Boyz second album is a more mellow sound for the Hip Hop band.

LOST BOYZ
Love, Peace & Nappiness
Universal

Coming out of Jamaica Estates, the Lost Boyz blew up last summer with their debut album. No matter how "real" you were claiming to keep it when "Renee" came on, you rolled your windows down and turned the volume up. While there was no doubt that the Lost Boyz knew how to keep people off the walls, they reeked of one-hit-wonder status.

On Love, Peace & Nappiness (Universal), the Lost Boyz have mellowed out in an attempt to grab a more serious audience. Unfortunately, they can't even sit at the same table as more high-browed rappers like De La Soul, A Tribe Called Quest, and KRS-One. The Lost Boyz are a party group at heart, and Love, Peace & Nappiness won't even get your feet moving.

The first single "Me and My Crazy World" comes off as a weak attempt to recapture the love escapades of "Renee" and the final track "From My Family To Yours" is a ballad about the death of Tupac and Biggie but lacks the emotional power of Puff Daddy's earlier tribute. While the Lost Boyz eschew violence and the gangster mentality — which is refreshing — they don't give you anything to think about.

The other problem, something Guru covered but few MC's have paid attention to, is that rappers Mr. Cheeks and Freaky Tah don't have the voices to demand your attention. Too often the rhymes of the two MC's get lost in the music, blending together and making it hard for you to say "Damn." However, Mr. Cheeks and Freaky do have skills. Lines like "It's over when I'm sober, so imagine if I'm drinking" prove that. They just need to learn to project better.

The biggest bright spot on this album is the debut of rapper Canibus. Canibus blesses the tracks "Beasts From The East" and "My Crew," showing off his verbal acrobatics. In fact, on "Beasts From The East" (a posse cut) he manages to outshine Redman, which is no easy feat. However, Canibus does not appear nearly enough to save this album. Old school–heads might want to take note that Luv Bug Starski appears on "Games."

Love, Peace & Nappiness does have a few good cuts, but not enough to save them from going the way of Black Sheep, Skee–Lo, and other one–hit wonders. Then again if House of Pain released a third album, whose to say these guys can't? ✓

ED HALEY
Forked Deer
Rounder Records

Recently released on the Cambridge label Rounder is a long–lost collection of old–time fiddle music by the late Ed Haley. The recordings on the 2–disc set Forked Deer are from discs that he made at his home in Ashland, Ky., in the late '40s, only a few years before his death.

Haley had one of the quickest bows to be heard in his time. He held the violin to his chest instead of under his chin to be able to attain certain effects, and he also stretched tunes to ten and twelve minutes, improvising his performances in the West Virginia/Kentucky/Ohio area in the '20s and '30s.

Most of the songs here are driving foot–stompers. Haley's fiddle attacks notes on all edges of a song, while family members play fast, rocking strums on guitar and mandolin providing a fine harmonic structure. Some Celtic strains leap out, such as "Lost Indian" and "Love Somebody." Haley's violin work is truly uplifting and wonderful on the 1896 piece, "Darn Dean" and the fine ensemble mix of "Cripple Creek."

Some of the tracks on this set could have been left off because they have so much noise from the original recordings, they are hard to listen to. Otherwise, it is a fine historical document. B (Joshua Boyd).

BOB FRANKE
Long Roads, Short Visits
Daring/Rounder Records

Recorded in Marblehead, Mass., folk singer–songwriter Bob Franke's latest Long Roads, Short Visits (Daring/Rounder) has an almost eerie, nocturnal quality to it. Acoustic and steel guitars, murmuring acoustic bass and bright harmony vocals seem to seep out of your stereo speakers and give a room ambience. Good job to Franke on his production.

Franke's lyrics conjure up images of loss of loved ones ("For Real"), foolish love ("Inland Sea") and guilt about our ecology ("In The Place Of Trust"). His singing has an almost annoyingly wispy — but stately tone — that of a Donovan or a Gordon Lightfoot. James Taylor also purveys a certain influence on the music, especially in the easy white–boy blues, "There's A Last Time For Everything." Smooth folk playing, and strong harmonies between Franke and Jennifer Kimball especially hold this album as a nice effort. B– (Joshua Boyd)

New Oasis release "Definitely" mediocre; the fab five return with their third release

COURTESY JILL FURMANOVSKY

The brothers Gallagher and company return for their anticipated follow up to (What's the Story?) Morning Glory

By Marty Keane

OASIS
Be Here Now
Epic

Asked what the message of rock 'n roll was, John Lennon once said, "To be here now." Fittingly enough, the unabashed Beatlemaniacs in Oasis have appropriated most of the above quote as the title of their much–anticipated third album, Be Here Now (Epic).

The 11–song album is a 72–minute monster designed to be blasted over massive sound systems at maximum volume, from Wembley to Foxboro. Arena rock? Be Here Now can only be fully appreciated in a football stadium with tens of thousands of inebriated worshipers singing along, fists–a– pumpin'.

Living room listening is another story, however.

For the first 90 seconds of the opening track, "D'You Know What I Mean?," the listener is intrigued by the sonic audacity: the sound of a helicopter, a heavy drum beat (sampled from N.W.A.'s "Straight Outta Compton"), the mass of guitars and the unmistakable Mancunian drawl of Liam Gallagher, oozing Cockney swagger — "Step off the train, all alone at dawn," he brays, "Back into the hole where I was born." It all builds impressively to a chorus that begs to be shouted from a rooftop.

But as "D'You Know What I Mean" slogs to a close 6 minutes later — clocking in at a prodigious 7 minutes 42 seconds — a disheartening limitation becomes clear: Liam's older brother Noel writes songs that are little more than glorified excuses for catchy, anthemic choruses. To their credit, Oasis have never claimed to anything more than a bunch of working–class blokes from Manchester who traverse in pleasant, if ultimately shallow, pop pleasures.

With an armada of layered guitars, walloping mid–tempo drums that suggest the influences of hip–hop, hard–dance, and Led Zeppelin's John Bonham, and lush orchestrations rife with strings and baroque horns, the elder Gallagher has made a record designed to overwhelm the listener. And overwhelm it does.

By the time the snoozy nine minute "All Around the World" returns for a meaningless two minute reprise at album's end, the listener will no doubt be screaming for relief from this bludgeoning repetition. There is simply no discernable reason why Noel Gallagher — who put himself on the rock map by deftly emulating the immediately accessible pop melodies of the Fab Four — should be driven to such unwarranted excess. Only the pretty "Don't Go Away" totally avoids this pratfall, and assumes the throne as the rightful heir to 1995's soaring power ballad, "Wonderwall."

The sheer density and prostrating nature of this rock landslide, while occasionally intoxicating, is too often little more than an elaborate mask for some of their slightest material to date, songs that borrow heavily from the Beatles, both lyrically ("Fool On the Hill" and "I Feel Fine" are name–dropped in the same line on "D'You Know What I Mean?") and conceptually, with a bevy of long–winded "Hey Jude"–style fadeouts.

While Noel Gallagher's love of Liverpool's finest export is unquestioned, the shtick is wearing perilously thin. Seriously, they should have known better than to cover one of your own songs. It's usually a pretty good indication that it's time to move on when the "new" songs begin to sound eerily similar to earlier B–sides.

"I Hope, I Think, I Know" is merely different lyrics over the same chord progression as "Step Out" (a song left off their last album because it sounded too much like a Stevie Wonder's "Uptight") — featured as a bonus track to the 1995 U.K. single of "Don't Look Back In Anger."

Still, for all their faults, Oasis have one fundamental trait sorely lacking in virtually all their rivals: the rock 'n roll attitude.

"Into my big mouth, you could fly a plane," Liam arrogantly sneers on the brisk, bashing "My Big Mouth" — easily the album's strongest track and a true gem. He later ponders, "Who'll put on my shoes when I'm walking, slowly down the Hall of Fame?"

The grinding guitars of Noel and Paul Arthurs are turned up to levels that would make even Spinal Tap cringe, and the song's rock–solid rhythm is deftly accentuated by drummer Alan White's insistent pummelling of his hi–hats.

Thanks to Liam's snide vocal delivery, the result is an uncanny approximation of the Sex Pistols punkish bravado circa '77 with a degree of arrogant haughtiness that would surely do Uncle Johnny proud. No one in rock today can turn a word as simple as "realize" into a three–syllable threat like this brat does.

Even if Be Here Now traffics in big–budget mediocrity and fails to live up to their two past releases, the comedic and self–effacing bombast suggest that the Gallaghers and their anonymous playmates enjoy the put–on, the hoax that rock 'n roll sometimes is — and that's refreshing enough. Sometimes. C+

"South Park" humors the non–P.C.

Comedy Central's new show takes the 1st amendment in stride

SOUTH PARK
Comedy Central
Wednesday, 10 p.m.

One can sum it up as the rags to riches story of the animation world — the adult animation world. What actually started as a sarcastic favor between friends, has recently exploded onto the cartoon scene as the most hilarious and jaw–dropping show on T.V. Through the combined efforts of creators Matt Stone and Trey Parker, "South Park" is the next revolutionary step in the new wave of adult animation.

This new era of cartoons for grown–ups has to be credited to the creators of "The Simpsons." Some of "South Park's" predecessor shows like "Dr. Katz," "Oddities" and "Beavis and Butt–head" have mainstreamed the night–time networks. Now, the adorable, foul–mouthed children of "South Park" have stolen the show.

All the way from the fictional wintery town of South Park, Colo. — which bears resemblance to Parker's hometown — the dynamic posse of Stan, (Eric) Cartman, Kyle and Kenny (who mysteriously dies in every episode), have a habit of leaving its audience miffed.

A few years back, college film students Parker and Stone jokingly created what is now the underground version of "South Park — The Spirit of Christmas." Its sickly twisted plot involving a bout between Santa Claus and Jesus Christ — not to mention an appearance by Brian Boitano — made "Beavis and Butt–head" seem suitable for a Saturday morning line–up.

Its primary intention was simply to be a Christmas gift for producer/friend Brian Graden, not an attempt at stardom. It wasn't long after that the cuss–rich cartoon had created an underground buzz. Somehow it eventually found its way into the hands of the Smashing Pumpkins, who played the tape as pre–show entertainment. Since then, the primitive production of "The Spirit of Christmas" has morphed into the newest comedy sensation on television — "South Park."

Under a recently signed contract with the cable network Comedy Central, the creators of "South Park" have released six new episodes. Even with censorship restrictions placed on the show by the network, the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) continues to be an obstacle for Comedy Central. So far "South Park" hasn't crossed any "fine" lines, but that's not to say the show isn't skating on thin ice.

"Comedy Central lets us get away with so much," Parker said recently in a interview with Detour magazine.

It's hard to put a finger on what exactly attracts the public to watching these cute and disrespectful children of "South Park." Considering the targeted audience ranges in age from 14 to 35 — it could just be "South Park" brings about the re–birth of a comedy long gone. It resembles that irreverent 80's humor, popping out loads of religious blasphemy and sexual innuendos without any refrain. Kyle is the "stupid Jew," Cartman is the "fat ass bastard" who loves Cheesy Poofs and his cat is a "dildo." The question is will this radical show survive in the mainstream politically correct market?

As to the future of "South Park" fever — so far it's a wide open road. Fresh new episodes will continue to run for the remainder of the season, including a "South Park Christmas Special" on Dec. 17. "South Park's" concrete base with Comedy Central should keep them in the game for a while. Should it flop however, the "Three Amigos" production crew of "South Park" have already completed their newest project, Orgazmo — a comic feature film about the pornographic film industry.

UConn ends Minutewomen's unbeaten streak, 2–1

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

If you had not done a certain something in almost three years, would you not be a little pent up and frustrated?

That must have been the feeling the No. 10 University of Massachusetts women's soccer team must have had coming into their match with No. 7 Connecticut yesterday afternoon, since the Minutewomen have not scored a goal in the last four matches against their main rivals, the Huskies. For the first time since the 1994 season, UMass was able to break UConn's scoring stranglehold on freshman midfielder Brooke Bartlett's goal at the 21:28 mark.

Bartlett collected her blocked crossing pass 15 yards out from the goal, and hammered a low, left–footed blast inside the post to the left of the Huskies' sophomore goalkeeper Jennifer Traw. But goals by U.S. National Team member Sara Whalen and senior forward Naomi Stone halted the Minutewomen's upset bid, and UConn (7–1) took a 2–1 win yesterday at Ruth J. Totman Field. It was UMass' first loss of the season, dropping them to 6–1.

Massachusetts	1

For UMass coach Jim Rudy, the difference between the skillful, yet not quick Minutewomen squads of past years to the current edition that is more speedy, but less experienced, was evident — that fact gave his team more of a chance to compete against the speed of UConn, and they did.

"We engaged and battled well today, and last year we had to absorb, absorb, absorb and hope," Rudy said. "This year, we could come out and get at them a little bit, and in the first half, I thought we played well. The second half, they had more of the game, and we had surges here and there.

"This is all good information for us, and we needed to be challenged by a superior team, who would make you pay for errors, and they did."

Bartlett is just one of those freshman that have come into the UMass lineup this season to make an impact. After a series of Atlantic 10 conference games that saw the Minutewomen get minutely challenged, this game against No. 7 UConn was what it is all about.

"It was a good experience for me, and I've been looking forward to this game for a long time," Bartlett said. "I looked up to the UConn program in high school, and I was glad I came here so I could give them a challenge. Getting a goal is just the added excitement.

"We just have to come out harder next time, and this is just an experience to learn from. We've gone from having a lot of injuries to playing UConn 2–1, and that's great."

Whalen paced the Huskies attack by being the offensive catalyst for each UConn goal, assisting on Stone's goal. Connecticut coach Len Tsantiris' must have seen his senior veteran admirably run the left flank for the U.S. team this summer, because Whalen played central midfield to start the match — compared to her old position at sweeper.

"Whalen was a big factor, and her international and national level showed today," Rudy said. "It was obvious that she was playing at a speed higher than anyone else, and she certainly factored in on those two goals. I could see the second goal coming a mile away, and that's just a mental error by our people.

"But, she's a poacher, and her speed is awesome. I think Tsantiris is still trying to figure out how this is all supposed to fit together. But, that team has the potential of being better than last year's team."

The rock of the backline of the UMass defense, junior defender Amanda Thompson, witnessed first-hand the game Whalen can bring to an opponent. In past years, the UMass defense has been able to control her game, but for just a few moments in yesterday's match, Whalen was able to break on through to the other side.

"The UConn coach played her on the outside in the second half, and I think that is where she belongs," said Thompson, about Whalen's switch from center–mid to the flank. "She's a really fast player, and she has a game where she can exploit the outside because she is faster than a lot of people.

"She really did well in the second half, and unfortunately, we didn't cover her as well as we did in the first half."

The beginning of the match saw the Minutewomen come out with some opening jitters. An early scoring opportunity by freshman forward Jen Carlson just bounced off the crossbar in the 3rd minute, but afterwards, UMass started to get on a roll. In the 11th minute, senior defender Erica Iverson served a cross from the right flank, with sophomore forward Emma Kurowski sending her header just over the crossbar herself.

However, it was Bartlett who scored the first goal of the game, and the Minutewomen had their first lead over UConn in three years. The UMass frontline continued to successfully pressure the Husky defenders through the majority of the half, but UConn began to find space in the final third of the pitch in the last fifteen minutes of the half.

That culminated at the 37:00 mark, with Whalen sliding away from four UMass players to score from 10 yards out, beating senior keeper Danielle Dion low to her left. Both teams went into the half at 1–1, and the Minutewomen came out fast, with freshman forward Kara Green teaming up with sophomore forward Kate Webb to pressure the Husky goal in the 47th minute.

But, after the 55th minute, UConn began to step up, and Dion made a diving save to her right in the 68th minute off of a bending shot from 15 yards out by freshman midfielder Lauren Molinaro.

Six minutes later, the Husky offense managed to reel off five consecutive corner kicks in the span of two minutes, but UMass held back any distinct scoring chance until Thompson's back save at the far post on the fifth corner.

After a failed clear, though, Whalen was able to beat senior defender Amy Burrill to the ball, running down the right flank to serve a perfect cross to the boot of Stone to put UConn up for good at 2–1. A late opportunity by Green, blasting a shot from the right–hand side of the goal that Traw just got a hand on, but the ensuing corner was to no avail, and so was the Minutewomen's late offensive surge.

"That would have been great if Kara scored, and she's been pulling off gamewinners left and right," Bartlett said. "It would have been awesome if she could have pulled it off, and have us go into overtime, but what can you do?"

For Thompson, the team has to focus on the rest of the season, and take the lessons learned in another loss to UConn to heart. Nothing is guaranteed, but the heart of the UConn–UMass rivalry is the NCAA Tournament, and she hopes they can face them one more time.

"The team can get out of this that we were ahead at one point, but we ended up losing it, so we have to focus on the entire game," Thompson said. "We have to look forward to the future, and just win the rest of our games. If we get to the Tournament, we'll be ready for them.

"They'll be thinking now, and they might have to be back on their heels, because we're UMass."

Oh, Peyton. How art thou forsaken thee.

In a three–hour span on Saturday, (hereby declared "Black Saturday"), all my predictions, all my bold declarations, basically everything, crumbled like a cookie on Orlando Pace's plate.

Down goes Brock Huard with a sprained ankle. Down goes Washington.

Down goes Peyton Manning into the arms of a swarming Gator defense. Down go the Vols.

But wait, I knew the Gators were gonna win, and I knew Nebraska would upset the Huskies, I swear. I changed my mind on Saturday at about 3:20 p.m. Swear to God.

Okay, I'm lying like a cheap rug in the lobby of Mackimmie. (Or any dorm really. I'm not picky.)

I should have known it was coming. Plenty of people informed me on Friday night that my picks would be, in fact, incorrect, including a certain Minuteman hurler who was so adamant about the Gators that I bet him if Tennessee lost, I'd put his name in the paper, (well, an alias, really) along with his glorious pick.

Congrats, Billy Hopps, you were right. Peyton choked.

But let's discuss the aftermath. Both Nebraska and Florida are now serious National Championship contenders, and UT and Washington can kiss the Orange Bowl goodbye.

Peyton has seriously damaged his Heisman chances, though if he does put up sick numbers for the rest of the year he'll still win because Randy Moss plays at Marshall and is a wide–out, which thereby excludes his sick numbers.

The Big Ten will now probably have its champ be one of the two schools in the National Championship picture come January, provided one of them can come out of there unscathed, (which might be tough considering how Michigan and Michigan St. have looked). Florida looks like they might not lose until Steve Spurrier leaves, (which won't be too, too long), and FSU hasn't done anything to make people think they'll lose, besides the fact that Thad Busby's their quarterback.

Oh, it's maddening. But then, that's why we love it. And it's also why college football makes the NFL look like an 18–week PBS telethon. (17,000 for the Oilers game? Come on, kids. Come on.)

Hey Dad, can I rake the leaves instead?

There are some games on this weekend that flat out suck. So, I thought we'd talk about them. My picks for this week's clunkers.

Maryland at Temple. Temple 6–3.

Texas A&M at North Texas. North Texas 27–0. (You know I still keep it real with the Eagles.)

Akron at LSU. LSU 384–6. (It'll look like a Pats game.)

Navy at Duke. Navy 38–7. (Duke is, in Massachusetts terms, "wicked bad".)

Booty Schwag of the Week Award...

Notre Dame has their own TV contract with NBC, have won like a bazillion national titles (not an exact figure) and have a movie about them.

But it wasn't until Saturday that they finally reached the pinnacle of college football.

That's right, fans. Crown the Irish. They've won the Schwag.

How, do you ask, did they pull it off? It was a lot of things. Lack of a quarterback. Lack of talent at wide–out. Bad play–calling.

In other words, they've worked hard to get the Schwag. For that, I salute them.

See, most teams would see Ron Powlus and go, "Wait. Let's try to get a quarterback who's good." But the Irish had higher goals.

Minutewomen open A–10 play vs. Rhody

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

It is understandable that today's game against Rhode Island (3:30 p.m.) may take on a different level of importance for the members of the University of Massachusetts field hockey team.

It is, after all, the start to their conference season.

"Your conference is always very, very important," UMass coach Patty Shea said. "That really is a lot of your focus — within your conference."

Focusing on conference games now results in a bigger pay–off for member schools of the Atlantic 10. In a policy that went into effect last year, the winner of the league tournament receives an automatic bid to an NCAA tournament play–in game.

"As far as the NCAAs, you have other alternatives than the poll," Shea said. "You use your conference, so that really is the nuts and bolts of your season right there."

The Minutewomen were the first beneficiaries of this new process, as they claimed an automatic play–in against Ball State by virtue of winning the A–10 Tournament.

This year, UMass (3–4) starts its march toward the postseason against the Rams. URI has suffered a rough start to its season, dropping six straight contests that have seen the Rams score only two goals.

Included on Rhode Island's early season slate was Connecticut, which drubbed the Rams, 11–0, and California, a team UMass has already faced as well.

The season–opening opponent for both teams, Cal beat URI, 3–0, before falling to UMass, 8–1.

Just as the scores against the teams' common foe indicates two completely different games, the goals–scored lists for UMass and URI also contrast each other.

For Rhode Island, only Angela Bashore and Lynn Tumer have found the back of their opponents' cage — both in a 5– 2 loss to Georgetown on Sunday.

The Minutewomen, on the other hand, boast the top two scorers on the A–10 overall scoring chart. Erica Johnston (7 goals, 1 assist, 15 points) and Vicky Browne (3g, 4a, 10pts) top a list that also includes Chris Millbauer (3g, 2a, 8pts), Courtney MacLean (2g, 1a, 5pts), Kristen Schmidt (1g, 1a, 3pts) and Amy Ott (2a, 2pts) in its top 25.

UMass also has a hold on two of the conference's top five overall goal–keeping spots, as Michelle Crooks, who played the entire second half of Saturday's game at Northeastern, and Zowie Tucker check in at No. 1 and No. 5, respectively.

Tucker has compiled .711 save percentage in 467 minutes of work, while Crooks has a perfect 1.000 percentage for her time in goal.

Israeli guards trade gunfire in Jordan

AMMAN, Jordan — (AP) Two Israeli Embassy security guards traded gunfire with assailants in a car in Jordan's capital on Monday. The Israelis were slightly wounded and one man in the fleeing vehicle was hit.

Jordan's King Hussein condemned the attack as "disgraceful" and visited the two Israelis in the hospital. The attackers would be severely punished, the king promised, and he presented the Israelis with watches.

Hussein telephoned Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to express his regrets for the attack. In a television broadcast, Jordanian officials also offered a "substantial reward" for help in finding the attackers.

The Israelis, Yaakov Levine and Amikam Hadar, were attacked as they drove to work, Israeli Embassy spokesman Roey Gilad said, adding they were "in a good condition and recovering... from slight gunshot wounds." Israel's ambassador Oded Eran told a news conference that one Israeli was hit above the knee and the other in the pelvis.

Jordanian officials said the attackers — presumably Jordanians — chased the Israelis in Amman's upscale neighborhood of Deir Ghbar, where the U.S. Embassy and the homes of several Israeli diplomats are located.

Ole Miss dorm sleepover idea falls flat

JACKSON, Miss. — (AP) The right to have overnight visitors of the opposite sex is but a dream to students in the dormitories at the University of Mississippi.

A new policy allowing "sleepovers" on weekends was scheduled to take effect last weekend but was scrapped by university officials amid complaints from parents, state lawmakers and religious leaders.

"They caught somebody sleeping on that one. That's bad, bad, bad policy," said state Sen. Hillman Frazier. "We're still the Bible Belt. Some things are a no-no in our state, especially when it deals with state tax dollars."

No college in Mississippi allows men and women to share dorm rooms overnight. Public colleges in neighboring Alabama and Louisiana have similar bans, though it is common for universities across the country to allow overnight visitors of the opposite sex, especially on weekends.

Ole Miss dorm residents voted overwhelmingly Sept. 2 to allow 1,200 upperclassmen to have guests of the opposite sex in their rooms from noon Friday to midnight Sunday. The idea came from a student survey last fall.

In vetoing the change, College Board members said that it violates a state policy against coed dorms and that proper channels had not been followed.

Campus-wide bike registration continues

LAUREN KOSKY / COLLEGIAN

Ben Chappell, a junior art major, locks up his bike with the help of Jon Chappell, a Senior art major, by the Student Union.

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

Bicyclists at the University of Massachusetts have the opportunity of registering their bicycles for free with the Public Safety Department. By doing so, students minimize the chances of having their bikes stolen.

"My main objective is to reach out to freshman and first year students. Commuters and upperclassmen who have been around for a while know the routine, they know what locks are the best and which ones are not," said Public Safety officer Neil Lunney, who has been working with the bike registration program for eight years.

However, Lunney said, many upperclassmen have still not registered their bikes.

Last week, Public Safety held a bike registration program at the Student Union, at which a total of 128 bikes were registered.

Even though bike registration week is over, students can go to the UMass Police Department Monday through Friday until 3 p.m. to register their bikes.

Once a bike is registered, a sticker with a registration number is attached to the frame of the bicycle and the bicycle's serial number along with a description is entered into the police system.

Students also have the option of getting their social security number or birthdate engraved on the bike for description purposes if the bicycle is stolen.

Once a bicycle is registered, the information will remain in the police system for five years. In addition, students will receive information regarding the best way to secure a bike.

Lunney said the best lock for students to secure their bike with is the U–lock.

"Students should only use cable locks as a secondary lock. In all my years of registering bikes I have only found one bike that was stolen where the bike owner used a U– lock, the rest have always been cable locks," he said.

Bicycle Co–Op employee Pat Hackleman agrees.

"No matter what kind of bike a person has when they come in to buy a lock, I always tell them to get a kryptonite U–lock," said Hackleman.

The Bicycle Co–Op sells U–locks for $25.

Hackleman said that although cable locks cost about $15, "it is worth it to spend an extra $10 for a lock that is going to keep your bike safer."

"I like to make students aware, give them a fair chance to take care of their bikes before something bad occurs. It is their bike, their responsibility and they need to take precautions to keep it secure," Lunney said.

According to Hackleman and Lunney, the bicycles that are stolen more often on campus are Treks, Diamond Backs, Cannon Dales and Mongooses. Each bike has a value of $200– $500 or more.

"A lot of bikes are stolen, but many bike parts are stolen as well," Lunney said.

> "I like to make students aware, give them a fair chance to take care of their bikes before something bad occurs. It is their bike, their responsibility and they need to take precautions to keep it secure,"
> Public Safety officer Neil Lunney.

According to police reports, 65 bikes and four bike parts were reported stolen during the last six months of 1994, 124 bikes and 12 parts were stolen during 1995, 79 bikes and 15 parts were reported stolen in 1996.

As for 1997, 24 bikes and four parts were reported stolen from January to May. Data has not been released for the rest of the year, but since classes have begun bikes have been reported stolen according to the police log.

Lunney said that to protect parts being stolen, students with quick release seats should always bring their seats with them and whenever possible, bike owners should take off the front tire and secure it with the back tire.

Although bicycle thefts occur in all the residential areas, Lunney said the majority of the thefts occur in Southwest Residential Area.

After surveying some bike racks around Southwest residential halls and academic halls it is apparent why so many bikes are easily stolen — many bicycles are not properly secured.

Lunney wants to stress the importance of students knowing vital information about their bikes.

"Regardless if their bicycle is registered students should always know their serial number, make and model and any engravings and other descriptions," he said.

Lunney said that most bikes that are stolen on campus are not registered with the UMPD, because he says the bike "registration sticker acts as a deterrent."

In addition to proper bike locks, bike racks are also a major concern to Lunney.

Many bike racks are not in good locations. They are

College students use, abuse credit

Beth McCarthy
Collegian Staff

How's Your Credit?

Like most college students, Paul Brescia, a junior Wildlife and Fisheries major, couldn't resist a 20 percent discount off his purchase if he would only fill out the credit card application.

With credit card companies hounding students with offers for free t–shirts, Frisbees and other fun prizes all over college campuses, it is not so surprising that students like Brescia apply for several cards.

Between department store cards, phone cards and the number of Visa and MasterCards that are offered, it may not be surprising to hear that, according to the American Banker Consumer Survey, 20 percent of college students have four or more credit cards.

What may come as a bit of a surprise is that Brescia said they are responsible about the cards that they do have.

They pay well over the balance due every month, they don't use their cards very often and they don't keep every card they are mailed.

In fact, according to the Visa Scholars and Cents study, 90 percent of students think of themselves as responsible card owners.

This study was done between 1996–1997 and was based on phone interviews of 251 college students who had a major credit card in their name.

"Based on their track records with the college, Visa and its member banks have long regarded students as responsible users of credit," said Bob Couch, Sr. Vice President of Visa USA. "This new study confirms that the vast majority of college students keep their spending in line with their income and pay their bills on time."

Mel Stiller, Executive Director of the Consumer Credit Counselling Service of Massachusetts (CCCS), sees a much different crowd than those "responsible users of credit."

The CCCS is a non–profit organization whose only responsibility is to provide counselling for people with financial problems.

"What we see here are people having problems," said Stiller, referring to those who have found themselves in serious credit debt. "We are seeing more and more young people with these kinds of problems."

A very typical situation is that a student will accumulate a significant debt in school, between student loans and credit cards, and then they graduate without getting that high paying job they were anticipating, Stiller said.

Then they are faced with having to buy a car, pay rent, utilities and have enough for basic living.

So what about this Visa study that paints such a rosy picture of credit?

"Would you expect any other answer from Visa?" asked John Reske, V.P. and Director of Marketing for the UMass/Five College Credit Union.

Faculty Senate ready to tackle tough issues

By Tamar Carroll
Collegian Staff

The Honors College, the creation of a College of Life Sciences, Chancellor David K. Scott's Strategic Action Plan, the aftermath of the Goodell Takeover — these are the major issues on campus this semester, and they will all be tackled by the Faculty Senate.

Although many students are unaware of the Senate or confused about its function, it is one of the most important forums on campus, serving as a watchdog for the administration and a source of information for the entire campus body.

Composed of 120 faculty members from every department, the Faculty Senate reviews all aspects of the University, from academics to the quality of life, and advises the administration on policy decisions and courses of action.

In an interview with The Massachusetts Daily Collegian this week, Senate President John Bracey discussed the role and significance of the Faculty Senate in the campus community.

"The Senate is a body established under the authority of the Board of Trustees to give advice to the administration and to help with the academic side of the things," Bracey said. "It is the one forum where all parts of the campus come together; where students, faculty and administration all sit down together."

In its bimonthly meetings, the Senate provides an opportunity for students and faculty to gather information from campus leaders and to raise topics for consideration by both the Senate and the administration.

The meetings begin with an address from a prominent government, community, or campus leader, designed to

Clinton urges U.N. to end nuclear testing

By Ron Fournier
Associated Press

UNITED NATIONS — President Clinton sent the Senate the long-delayed global test-ban treaty Monday and urged members to "end all nuclear tests for all time" by approving the pact over the objections of some Republicans.

Announcing his action in an address to the United Nations' 52nd General Assembly, Clinton called the treaty "the longest sought, hardest fought prize in the history of arms control." He signed the accord a year ago but pocketed it while White House lobbyists tried to build support.

In a 19-minute speech to U.N. delegates, the president also called for a permanent international court to punish human rights violators.

And he pledged that the United States would pay nearly $1 billion in past-due U.N. fees to "put the question of debts and dues behind us once and for all."

Returning to the theme of his U.N. address last year, Clinton said the nations of the world must unite against "21st century predators." He warned, "We're all vulnerable to the reckless acts of rogue states and to an unholy axis of terrorists, drug traffick-

Library lecture discusses change in Latin America

By Anna Glozman
Collegian Correspondent

The changing realities of Latin America were discussed in a lecture given by Howard J. Wiarda and Leonard J. Horwitz, a professor of Latin American Studies at the University of Massachusetts, from the top of the W.E.B. Dubois Library on Monday.

The audience, which consisted of about 20 students and community members of different backgrounds, listened intently to Wiarda's talk on "The Democratic Revolution in Latin America," which was part of the activities planned this week to celebrate Latino Heritage.

One of Wiarda's main points was that the social structure of Latin America does not match contemporary North American images. He cited "old movies starring Bing Crosby and Carmen Maranda" and New Yorker magazine cartoons as sources for the skewed stereotypes.

"Men on horseback gallop in and out of the presidential palace with frequent regularity is often the North American understanding of Latin American politics," Wiarda said.

Wiarda differentiated between the revolutionary images of Che Guevara and Fidel Castro, and that of the fundamental transformation of society that countries such as Great Britian, Germany, and the United States underwent in earlier decades.

"I use the term 'revolution' advisidely," Wiarda said. "What is occurring in the region is a profounder and...deeper revolution."

The society Wiarda described as "feudal and quasi– medieval" is transforming into a "modern, dynamic, participatory more democratic, more pluralist kind of society."

He compared figures from three decades ago that show a 70 percent rural society becoming 70 percent urban, and a population that was 70 percent illiterate improving to 70 percent literate. Besides literacy, the per capita has also improved from $340 per person in 1960 to $800 per person last year, even holding constant for inflation.

According to Wiarda, this is a "remarkable transformation in a 37 year period."

"Public opinion polls in the region show overwhelming support for representative democratic government," Wiarda said.

Support for Marxist–type parties has been down since the collapse of the Soviet Union and due to the lack of success both In Cuba and Nicaragua, according to Wiarda.

The Latin Amercian embassies in the United States are mobilizing communities in order to get the U.S. government more interested In Latin American affairs, according to Wairda.

located in unlit and secluded areas around the dormitories.

One example he said is the bike rack located on the south side of John Adams Residential Hall.

"The bike rack is located on the opposite side of the main entrance and it's very dark at night. No one uses the rack because students know it's not a safe place to leave your bike at night," he said.

Lunney suspects that most of the bikes are stolen during the night or early morning hours.

"We get reports all the time that a student locked their bike at 5 p.m. then went out to get it at nine the next morning and it's gone," he said.

Other areas that concern him are the low-rises in Southwest. All the bike racks are located under the overhangs, where there is limited light and student security can not see if anyone is lurking around the bikes.

"Anyone could be waiting out here at 2 a.m. waiting to steal a bike," he said.

Bike racks need to be installed in well-lit areas around the residence halls, so students will feel safe while locking their bikes up and they also need to be in a visible place so if student security sees or hears anything suspicious they can report it.

Lunney also mentioned that students should not lock their bikes up next to wooden fences, such as the fences in front of Kennedy Residence Hall and Bartlett hall.

Fences explained Lunney are easy to break and regardless of the kind of lock a student has, the bikes can be stolen.

Lunney said he would like to see more bike racks installed and some present ones moved to better places.

Recently UMass received a donation of 100 new bike racks from Rack and Roll, a group of the Pioneer Valley Committee.

These new green upside-down U shaped bike racks are being installed around the Fine Arts Center and the School of Management Hall.

"The Rack and Roll program is responsible for getting some bike racks on the front of the PVTA buses, and, as a part of that program, they also managed to get some bike racks donated to the town of Amherst and UMass," said Cindy Haveman, Facilities Planner.

However there are no immediate plans for installing any of these new bike racks in residential areas."We have quickly found out that 100 racks don't spread out far on this campus. We are primarily installing them around the academic part of campus," she said.

Haveman said she hopes to receive more money soon or another donation of bike racks because she is aware of the need for more around the residential areas.

"In the future we are hoping to work closer with safety officials to decide where the best place to install the new bike racks around the residential areas would be," she added.

Anyone interested in registering their bicycle can go to the Public Safety Department in Dickinson Hall or call 545- 2121.

ers and international criminals."

The president had meetings scheduled with foreign leaders, including Russian Foreign Minister Yevgeny Primakov, before heading to the Metropolitan Opera's season-opening performance of "Carmen." He was returning to Washington Monday night.

His submisslon of the test-ban treaty is expected to stir opposition from GOP senators who don't trust arms control agreements or who insist that testing is needed to maintain America's nuclear stockpile.

The debate probably will restore battle lines from the vote on the Clinton-backed chemical weapons treaty, ratified in April after many lawmakers remained undecided until the last minute. The president needs about 22 Republican senators to join Democrats in support of the treaty.

"We intend to win this vote and failure is not an option," said Robert Bell, a senior White House arms control adviser. During a U.N. visit a year ago, Clinton became the first world leader to approve the historic Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty, which prohibits all nuclear test explosions.

The United States has not conducted a nuclear test since 1992. The treaty would take effect next September. A Senate vote is expected in the spring. The accord is signed by 146 countries, including Russia and China.

India, which has campaigned for total disarmament, lobbied against the treaty. Longtime adversary Pakistan won't endorse it unless India does. After his speech, Clinton was meeting with the prime ministers of both nations.

Still, the president said the treaty "will help prevent the nuclear powers from developing more advanced and more dangerous weapons. It will limit the possibilities for other states to acquire such devices."

On the sensitive issue of America's indebtedness to the U.N., Clinton promised to work with Congress to pay most of the money. Congress is expected to authorize about $900 million for the United Nations, provided the organization does not expand beyond current levels and agrees to put in a separate fund an additional $400 million that the United Nations claims it is owed but the United States has contested.

The president also backed changes to the U.N. Security Council. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright has already expressed support for giving permanent seats to Germany and Japan. The administration also supports adding three other seats for Latin America, Africa and Asia, with countries in those regions rotating as the council expands to 20 or 21.

"We've tried to plan this in the past but this is the first year we've been able to put it all together. We hope that it will become an annual event."

Among the local restaurants participating will be Peking Garden, Pruddy's, Paradise of India, Amherst Chinese Food, Indian Palace Garden and Amber Waves. Hillel House and Earthfoods have also planned to have a table set.

Drinks and desert will be free of charge, but the food will not.

inform the Senate on a specific issue. After the speaker is finished, there is an announcement period, where campus administrators, the faculty delegates to the Board of Trustees, the Student Government President and the Graduate Student Government President make short presentations to the Senate.

When the announcements are completed, there is a 10 minute question period during which Senate members can ask administrators questions on any topic related to the University.

"The question period is probably the most effective way to bring an issue to the administration and get a quick response," Bracey said. "In that sense, we are a microphone for the campus."

Following the question period, the Senate's various councils and committees present reports on a variety of subjects, ranging from new academic programs to concerns such as moving the football team into the 1-A Division.

The Senate floor is then opened for discussion.

The 25 councils and committees of the Senate are made up of faculty, student, administration and staff representatives. Approximately 20 percent of the faculty is actively involved on councils, more permanent groups that deal with policy matters, and committees, more temporary groups which serve watchdog functions.

Bracey said that several student positions on councils and committees are vacant.

"A number of committees have called for student representation, but students tend not to get involved unless there is a crisis," Bracey said.

Student representatives are appointed by the Student Government Association.

The Faculty Senate meets every other Thursday at 3:30 p.m. in Herter Hall 227.

The agenda for its next meeting, this afternoon, includes an address from Scott and a report from the University Computer and Electronic Communications Committee.

PRINCIPLES OF SOUND RETIREMENT INVESTING

EXERCISE REGULARLY AND YOU COULD LIVE LONGER. INVEST REGULARLY SO YOU CAN AFFORD TO.

Americans are living longer than ever. So it's quite possible you'll spend 20 or 30 years or more in retirement. Can you afford it? Unless you're independently wealthy, chances are you'll need more than your pension and Social Security to support the kind of lifestyle you'll want.

How can you help ensure that you'll be in good financial shape? Sign up for TIAA-CREF SRAs — tax-deferred annuities available only to people in education and research.

SRAs are easy. No pain, no sweat.

The best way to build strength — physical or fiscal — is to start at a level that's comfortable and add to your regimen as you go along.

With TIAA-CREF SRAs, you conveniently contribute through your employer's payroll system. You can start with a modest amount and increase your contribution as your salary grows.

The important thing is to start now. Delaying for even a year or two can have a big impact on the amount of income you'll have when you retire.

Your contributions are made with pretax dollars, so you pay less tax now. Your earnings are also tax-deferred, so your money can accumulate faster than in a taxable account with the same rate of return. You'll pay taxes on your contributions and earnings only when you receive them as income. There may be some Internal Revenue Code limitations or tax penalties if you withdraw the money before you turn 59½.

SRAs offer you a range of income choices, including lifetime income, payments over a fixed period, or cash. If your employer's plan includes loans, you can borrow against your SRA to meet your other needs.

ARLINGTON, Va. — A jury of seven women and five men was seated to hear sportscaster Marv Albert's sex trial yesterday after assuring a judge and attorneys they could handle graphic testimony about violent sex.

Perhaps opening a window into the defense strategy, Albert's lawyer Roy Black this morning asked about 20 potential jurors if any had ever seen the movie "Fatal Attraction." The film is about an obsessed woman who refused to let go of a failed love affair and stalked her ex-lover.

Opening arguments were expected yesterday afternoon, after a closed hearing on how much of the accuser's sexual past would be admitted into evidence. The state has a rape shield law that requires defense lawyers to show how an accuser's sexual history is relevant.

Albert is accused of severely biting a longtime lover and forcing her to perform oral sex. He pleaded innocent yesterday, just before jury selection began, to charges of forcible sodomy and assault and battery that, if he is convicted, could bring him a life sentence.

Defense attorneys plan to argue that Albert had consensual sex with his 42-year-old accuser. Black also asked the panel members if they would be uncomfortable with testimony about sex.

"Would there be anyone uncomfortable to sit on a case involving a sexual activity, something you hadn't done before, involving biting or something like that?" Black asked the panel in Arlington County Circuit Court.

No potential jurors said they would be uncomfortable. Nor did they say they would be disturbed by hearing about sex acts they themselves would not do.

One woman, who had a book titled "History of Christianity" with her in the courtroom, split with the other potential jurors on the question of whether they would think less of a person who watched adult movies. She indicated she would; she was not selected.

Prosecutor Richard Trodden asked jurors whether they had opinions on "a person's right to say what's going to happen to their body" and whether "just because there has been a relationship between two people that a member has automatically given the choice of what they're to do."

Arlington County Circuit Judge Benjamin Kendrick had warned the jury candidates: "There's going to be testimony about oral sex and it may be graphic."

Albert had little to say as he passed photographers and nearly 100 reporters when he walked into the Arlington County Courthouse. "Sorry I can't talk," he said as he gripped the hand of his fiancee, ESPN producer Heather Faulkner.

Albert and his team of about 10 lawyers and researchers took their places in the courtroom about an hour before jury selection began. Also in court were Albert's father, Max Albert; his son, New York Rangers announcer Kenny Albert; and his daughter, Denise. Legal experts say defense lawyers probably will try to turn the tables on the 42-year-old accuser, arguing that she is a liar or that she had some reason to seek revenge on Albert after their encounter in a hotel room Feb. 12.

"A defense lawyer's job, regardless of the nature of the crime, is to a certain extent to put the victim on trial," said John Fletcher, a Norfolk defense attorney.

Israelis seal West Bank villages

By Mohammed Daraghmeh
Associated Press

NABLUS, West Bank — Israeli soldiers sealed several West Bank villages yesterday in their hunt for Islamic militants involved in two suicide bombings in Jerusalem.

In one village, Palestinians burned tires and threw stones at soldiers manning roadblocks. One Israeli soldier, kneeling on the ground, aimed his assault rifle toward a village to deter residents from trying to leave. The main road was closed off with a string of metal spikes.

Israel TV's Channel Two said the closure of the villages was intended to prevent a bomb ready for use from reaching Israel. Five such explosives already have been detonated in two suicide bomb attacks.

Hamas claimed responsibility for the bombings July 30 and Sept. 4, in which 25 people died, including the five assailants. Israel has detained hundreds of suspected Hamas activists in response to the bombings. The campaign intensified early Sunday when Israel troops raided several West Bank villages.

In the West Bank village of Dura, south of Hebron, troops closed down the central mosque, whose prayer leader is Nayef Rajoub, a brother of the Palestinians' West Bank security chief, Jibril Rajoub.

Nayef Rajoub said soldiers seized about 100 books on geography, politics and other issues. Copies of the Muslim holy book, the Koran, were left untouched, he said.

He said the raid underscored how little the Palestinians have gained from the peace accords. Dura is run by the Palestinian Authority, but Israel retains overall control over security as it does in all the other West Bank villages.

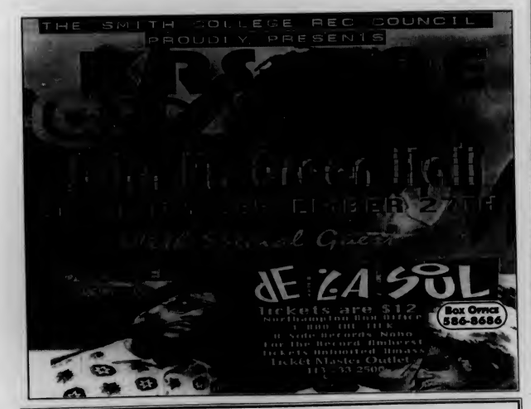
"Our own security officers can't do anything to help. It just shows that (the peace agreement) can only bring disaster to our people," Rajoub said, adding that he has complained to his brother.

The mosque was to remain closed for two months, according to a military order pasted on the door. However, Dura residents ignored the order and entered the building for prayers.

Troops also ordered the closure of a youth club affiliated with Hamas in the nearby village of Samoa. Palestinian residents said. Also yesterday, Israel army radio said Netanyahu has ordered police to prevent more Jewish settlers from moving into Arab neighborhoods of Jerusalem. Such an order, if confirmed, would be a policy shift for Netanyahu, who has staunchly supported Jewish settler groups buying Arab homes in disputed areas of the city.

Last week, Jewish settlers moved into two homes in the Arab neighborhood of Ras al-Amud, located in a part of east Jerusalem claimed by the Palestinians as a future capital. Netanyahu opposed the move, citing warnings by security officials that establishing a new Jewish enclave could cause Palestinian riots.

The government negotiated a deal under which the three settler families were replaced by 10 Jewish seminary students who are to serve as watchmen. Netanyahu assured the Palestinians the two homes, owned by Miami millionaire Irving Moskowitz, would not serve as a bridgehead for a new Jewish neighborhood.



Netanyahu put additional distance yesterday between his government and the Ras al-Amud enclave, telling reporters during a visit to Vienna, Austria: "We will not allow a Jewish neighborhood to be built in Ras al-Amud."

Confessions of an '80s junkie

I love cheesy music.

Don't get me wrong. I like to think of myself as a bit of music buff, a sort of sports writer who is, deep down, a wanna-be Rolling Stone correspondent. I love to talk music. So-called "good music." (You know, college radio icons like Liz Phair, the Pixies, R.E.M, etc.)

But I'm sick of having to deal with the chuckles and patronization from those kids that own 214 Dead bootlegs, every Phish show from 1987–on (don't get me wrong, I like Phish) and the complete works of Bob Dylan — and thus are too cool to like the scattered Frankie Goes to Hollywood song. (Well, the only Frankie Goes to Hollywood song, I guess.)

Luke Meredith

But that is not me. I am, at heart, a big cheeseball.

So, in accordance with my desire to come clean, diss any music critic aspirations, and align myself with my hopelessly nostalgic brothers and sisters, I present to you my 10 favorite songs from the 1980s. Why? Because I know you love them too.

May Wang Chung save our souls.

10. "Cruel Summer"— Bananarama

Set in the hot, lurid summer of 1984, as the second- biggest hit from The Karate Kid. Its pulsing rhythm and introspective tone told the world that hey, it might be tough, but a transplanted Jersey boy from Receda and a girl from the Valley can make it in this cruel world.

Great stuff.

9. "Don't Dream It's Over"— Crowded House

If I hadn't grown up in Methuen, I might have heard of this song before college. But, alas, I grew up in a town where the CVS was always out of Aqua Net, and Bon Jovi ruled the airwaves.

8. "Living on a Prayer"— Bon Jovi

But hey, I love Bon Jovi.

My sister claims that Jon Bon Jovi wrapped one of her bandannas around his head during a 1984 concert, in which they opening up for Ratt. (In her adolescent panting, she chucked it on stage.)

It was like rock n' roll had come to my living room. An infatuation was born.

P.S. I had a dream a few nights ago that I bought a videotape with obscure Bon Jovi videos on it. Does this mean I have a problem? (I was also driving through Providence, R.I. on the way to the beach with P.J., my dad, incidentally enough, while being chased by somebody we couldn't see, but that's another story.)

7. "Up Where We Belong"— Joe Cocker and Jennifer Warnes

The first song I ever loved. I was six. (Sentimental even in kindergarten, baby.)

6. "Don't You Want Me"— Human League

This is the interactive portion of the column. "Don't You Want Me," although a classic, can easily be replaced here with your sixth favorite '80s song. (Hey, even "Mickey" would work here.)

5. "Get into the Groove"— Madonna

Okay, you can pick on me here. (Well, not really. I'm fragile.) I don't even like Madonna, but I love this song. It made me always want to see Desperately Seeking Susan. But I never have. (That and Bright Lights, Big City. Something about a coked–up Alex P. Keaton always seemed racy to me when I was 12.)

4. "Tempted"— Squeeze

Because, hey, we've all been tempted by "the fruit of another" at one point in our lives. I think this came in second for Frank and Kathie Lee's wedding song. (Who said I can't be topical?)

3. "I Will Survive"— Gloria Gaynor

Girl power, baby. Despite the fact that I always get scared when I'm in a roomful of girls and this song comes on, and the fact that it came out in 1979 (shh, they'll never know), I still think of this as a great '80s song.

You go, girl.

2. "Total Eclipse of the Heart"— Bonnie Tyler

The cheesiest love song of all–time, but also one of the best. Words escape me, but this song speaks to me.

All I wanna do when I hear this is get Bonnie a bowl of chicken soup and a blanket and tell her, "Hey, it'll be okay. There are plenty of fish in the sea."

And dream of being that fish.

1. "Come on Eileen"— Dexy's Midnight Runners

You know, I'll never know who Dexy is, and I'll never know who Eileen is, but if you've ever been young, drunk and anxious on a hot August night, with summer almost over, and the girl you're trying to hook up with almost ready to bite, this is the song.

And since being young, drunk and anxious on a hot August night with a girl almost ready to bite epitomizes what life is all about, I'll take "Come On Eileen" any day.

In my book, Dexy's a pretty lucky guy, even if he did spend his days in a perm and overalls.

The weirdest thing...

It is the weirdest thing. It happens quite regularly, too. What am I talking about? The way that some of us UMass women lose our minds on the weekends.

Ladies, don't deny it. You know you've done it, or had it done to you at least once. Now before all of your minds jump to some other conclusion, let me explain.

Here's the scenario.

A bunch of girls, walking down the street on a Tuesday afternoon. Some guy drives by and the car full of fine young men decide the best thing to do at that particular moment is to lean out the windows and yell something unintelligible and honk.

Mary Barrett

Of course, we women are all extremely impressed. In fact, we usually have to physically restrain each other from running after your beautiful 1984 Chevy Nova and jumping in.

OK, well maybe not.

In this situation, we usually make some snotty comment about you guys, roll our eyes or make some other facial expression, laugh, ignore you completely, or, well... you get the point. This kind of response is somewhat expected, what with this whole "girl power" craze happening. Now, though, if you were to change a Tuesday afternoon to a Friday or Saturday night, we would be completely different people.

Instead of showing we wouldn't be a part of that display of, um, affection, we actually encourage it. After the honking and the whooping, we'll laugh or giggle (which is almost worse), wave and be altogether really silly.

Why? Do we really need unsolicited comments from strangers to make us feel more attractive?

A couple of weeks ago, I went to a frat party with seven other girls. As we walked up the sidewalk to the house, there were actually guys on either side appraising us as we went in.

Did we mind? No, not really. When they made a comment on how we were dressed like a rainbow, (all of our shirts were different colors), we all giggled and smiled, which had them go on for a while longer. If anyone had used those cheesy lines on us at any other time, we would have laughed and walked away. Not then. Then we thought (or made them believe) that they were really clever.

Maybe it's the beer...

Prozac not bad

To the Editor:

Jonathan Swartz's opinion piece regarding Prozac had me seeing red. Yes, advertising — any advertising — is insidious. Yes, it's one-sided. However, simply because Prozac is a prescription antidepressant doesn't mean it's any more morally questionable than advertising for, say, Coke. Eli Lily, the makers of Prozac, are trying to sell a product. A product that is by and large useful and safe. And above all necessary.

Depression is a serious illness brought about by chemical imbalances in the brain. These imbalances are generally caused by genetic and environmental factors. In research cited by Peter Kramer, author of Listening To Prozac, Rhesus Monkeys that were denied nurturing contact with their mothers tended to have much lower levels of Serotonin, a vital neurotransmitter that is responsible for regulating sleep and mood.

Depressed people have lower than normal levels of serotonin as well. Depressed people have severe mood swings, are often anxious, and have difficulty sleeping. Depressed people are often exposed to traumatic experiences in early childhood as well as continuous trauma as they grow older. Thus, the research strongly indicates that depression is a chemical imbalance brought about by years of neglect and/or trauma. Prozac and other drugs in the same family allow the brain to maintain the normal level of serotonin. The use of drugs to treat depression is nothing new. Before Prozac there were tricyclics. Before tricyclics amphetamines were used. Which brings me to a ridiculous analogy made by Jonathan Swartz between Ritalin and Prozac. Apples and oranges. Prozac's not an upper. Anyone can take a pill, and nothing will happen. Nothing even begins to happen until approximately 3 days of sustained use. Full effect takes up to two weeks. The drug provides no immediate gratification, and is thus not addictive.

So, Mr. Swartz, it's not as simple as "You got a problem? We've got an easy solution." This statement is indicative of a slew of common misconceptions regarding the illness. Depression is not a bad day. People may say they're depressed if their favorite sweater has been ruined in the laundry. They're not. They're probably sad or angry or frustrated, but not depressed. The important distinction is that they will eventually (probably pretty quickly, in fact) accept the loss and get on with life. A depressed person will often feel sad, hopeless or anxious—all normal emotions. But if asked, the depressed person probably won't be able to tie them to any specific event in his or her life. Ask a depressed person why he or she is depressed and the typical response is a shrug of the shoulders. A defeated and sad shrug of the shoulders. A depressed person won't "get over" depression. He or she may be able to temporarily dispose of the associated feelings, but almost always they will return with greater intensity. Depression isn't "part of everyone's troublesome internal dialogue: how do I stay happy?", as you assert. Exactly the opposite: the depressed ask a far more troubling question: "How do I stop being so miserable?" A big, big difference.

How do I know? Because I have been — and occasionally still am — visited by depression. I tried for years to overcome the misery. I tried all sorts of things: dietary changes, exercise, extended periods of therapy, even religion. They all helped, and they're all still a part of my life. However, none of them cured. What did the most good was taking Prozac for a year. Prozac allowed me to focus on the causes, rather than the overwhelming symptoms. It's not at all that I was trying find a shortcut to happiness. I simply wanted to treat my illness so I could begin the journey. And as anyone alive knows, living ain't easy. No matter what drug you take.

Frankly, Mr. Swartz, I don't appreciate you telling me that somehow I took the easy way out. You're no expert; you obviously haven't experienced it. As an editorial columnist. You're in the privileged position of offering your viewpoint to the general public. The least you can do is make sure that it's based on facts. It's obvious you haven't. Unfounded opinions like yours contribute to the attitude that the depressed can get better by simply being tougher. Actually, they'll get worse. They avoid seeking treatment. Their misery continues. Their family life deteriorates. Their misery intensifies. Their work performance suffers. Seeing no way out, they may (and tragically often, do) commit suicide. Prozac, therapy and a myriad of other treatments can arrest this cycle.

I beg anyone who suspects that he or she may be depressed to talk to a doctor or psychologist. This horrible disease is 95% treatable. Don't let Jonathan Swartz convince you otherwise; you deserve all the treatments available. They're not cop-outs. They don't make the pursuit of happiness any easier. They simply make it possible to begin.

CRC doing no favors

To the Editor:

Wow! How in the world can the Cannabis Reform Coalition think in any way, shape or form that they are doing me any favors. Yeah, I live in the dorms, and have yet to see a true advocate of student rights, while taking a hit from a bong.

If they really cared about student rights they wouldn't be smelling up the hallways that I've lived in with that burning garbage, or selling drugs right outside my door.

I honestly believe that there are people truly fighting for cannabis reform. But the fact is most of these jokers come to UMass, exercise their "freedom" for a few years, grow up get married, then tell their kids they should "just say No!"

So the Cannabis Reform Coalition can watch all they want — smoking pot and burning incense is illegal, and since we live in a community, why don't they respect the rights of those who choose not to follow their crusade?

Confessions of a home brewer

DANIEL BODAH

At first heard about homebrewing in the late 1980s, a few years before the big microbrewing boom that's put quality beer back on this country's store shelves, in many ways, the homebrewing movement laid the path for the phenomenon of dark, hoppy, fruited and wheat beers.

Homebrewing is simply brewing your own beer. In the days before Sam Adams and Sierra Nevada, the only domestic brew worth calling beer was made by the Anchor Brewing Company in California, and their beer has always been quite expensive.

Those who were bored with the meager domestic selection could always turn to making beer in different styles for themselves. In fact, the creativity that homebrewing prompts is probably behind a lot of the wilder microbrews out there today.

A lot of people think brewing their own beer would be difficult or expensive, but neither is true. In fact, it's not that different from making bread.

Making beer is basically the process of growing a lot of yeast in sugary water. The sugar comes from malted grain, usually barley — it's the same yolk of sugar that the seeds would use to grow before they were able to photosynthesize.

Homebrewers have the choice of either soaking barley grain themselves, or buying a malt extract syrup and boiling that in water. Hops (which are the flowers of a vine related to Cannabis sativa) are added to the boiling sugar water (called wort) to add flavor and help preserve the finished beer. After the wort is cooked and has cooled down to room temperature, the yeast is added.

Yeast is actually a living being. Tiny little yeast beasts eat sugar. When the yeasts had its fill and needs to use the little girls room, it excretes alcohol and carbon dioxide.

So that's where the alcohol comes from. And, if the beer is unpasteurized (like homebrew) that's also where the carbonation comes from.

Of course, this is the simple version of the story. There are lots of ways to vary the taste of the final beer.

For instance, you can add some barley that's been roasted until it's dark brown and nutty-tasting — that is what's used to give the dark taste and color to stout or porter. There are a number of "specialty grains" for effects like this.

You can also use maple syrup or fruit to flavor and add sugar to your beer. Many homebrewers go wild with innovations like this — why not add some pomegranate to your beer and see how that works out?

For anyone interested in learning more, there is a whole network of homebrewers out there. A good place to start is the Internet newsgroup rec.crafts.homebrewing. You can also stop by one of the region's many microbrewing festivals, where homebrewing shops often set up tables. Finally, there is a homebrewing shop (Beer and Winemaking Supplies, Inc) in Northampton that stocks all the supplies one needs to get started, as well as a variety of books.

Brewing your own beer will increase your appreciation of the beer you buy as well as saving you a few bucks.

BREWIN' UP A STORM

mmmmmmmm.....BEER!

JORMA KANSANEN

There are many things holding the diverse student body of the Five College Area together. We all have our varying backgrounds and cultures, but among the numerous things we do share, one thing truly binds us together.

Yeah, work with me here — we're all united — united as one collective teeming mass of blood and sperm, with a common student culture to hold as one.

You curiously ask, in a tone that doesn't mask your utter embellishment, "What the hell are you talking about?"

I'm talking about a spiritual culture —alcohol, and more specifically in this case, beer.

If there's one thing that not just holds the student body of the Five College Area together, but the student body of the entire world, it's the pursuit of the spiritual drink.

Truthfully, beer suits the Pioneer Valley to the figurative T, because with the beautiful natural surroundings, and the strong undercurrent of environmentalism indigenous to our area, a drink brewed with the malt and hoppy fruits of Mother Natures basket should be our cup of tea, so to say.

Yeah, and don't you ever forget it.

Yet, even within the spiritual culture of beer that binds us all together, there are divisions. Not harsh (unless we're talking about the effect on your body the next morning) or threatening divisions, but subdivisions of flavor and quality.

Those subdivisions are easily encapsulated in a 50-yard stretch in uptown Amherst — the Time Out crowd (cops, they've been shut down due to youth of clientele) or the Delano's crowd vs. the Amherst Brewing Company crowd.

I myself enjoy any opportunity to imbibe the drink that makes you superior of the day one minute, and the schmuck of the century the next, but people do have their preferences between mass-produced (i.e. Delano's) and micro-brewed (i.e. ABC) beer.

Even though establishments like Delano's do have microbrews on tap, the average person who frequents such a place is more apt to pick up the $4-5.00 Miller Lite pitcher special — hey, I do it. Even though an establishment like ABC would never in its wildest imagination have Miller Lite on special, its consumer wants some flavor in their pursuit for the eternal buzz — hey, I do it.

The most obvious difference between mass-produced and micro-brewed beer is the flavor. Flat out, or regarding the fact "flat" is not the best word to use when discussing beer, I should say—no doubt. From Budweiser to Rolling Rock, the fluctuation in taste between the more popular mass-produced beers is minimal in comparison to the multitude of tastes that microbrews provide.

That is because mass-produced beer is entrenched in the pilsner-lager style of brewing, and the reason why you feel absolutely bloated after doing a funnel (that is, if you do that sort of thing) is because of its heavy carbonation. The flavor of the realm is almost cast in stone, unless you are a microbrewer, and then you can throw in a curve, such as a honey-pilsner, etc.

From pale ales (more hops) to bocks (more malt) to seasonal beers (fall brings in tributes to "Oktoberfest," and hints of caramel), microbrews provide a potpourri of flavor that lasts throughout the year.

Not that it is superior to mass-produced beer, because everyone's tastes are different, but there are more options.

The other major difference between the two styles of beer is the sheer truth of quality. Flavor is one thing, but if a beer makes you feel like you're going to wretch, then quality is the problem. The two factors are interrelated, because I have drank examples of both that have made me want to wretch, so flavor can only go so far.

Sorry, people, the fact of the matter is mass-produced beer is like cafeteria smoking — you never know what is going to be thrown into your chicken pot pie. Just take a look at a major brewery, and the vats of beer look more like muscle launching tubes (which can be true, especially after a night of Natty Light, correct?).

It seems like there are as many chemicals in a can of Budweiser then there are in a cigarette, which is not good. But, I still drink it... why ask why, you know?

With a traditional microbrew, you can count the amount of ingredients with two hands. No lie. It's like a gallon of Seelteet see-steam, you can route off its recipe in a single breath. I'll tell you one thing, I feel a hell of a lot different after a night of drinking Bud Ice than I do after a night of Berkshire Brewing Co's Octoberfest.

But anyway, beer is all about the act of getting together with your friends, and either having a couple or getting shit-faced -shattered, shattered. Go ahead, bite the Big Apple, but don't mind the fact you're not a maggot for choosing one style of beer over another.

It's your choice, whether you're a Delano-ite or you get down with the ABCs of life, and just go out and responsibly enjoy our spiritual culture.

Thank you for your time.

Ruth Brown releases new album

"Pray for me, o mama, pray for me, pray for me, / Lord I got a long holdover, and I can't go free." Desolate, lonely words like these often found themselves echoing out of huge Southern state penitentiaries in the pre–Segregation days. Back then, an African–American man could find himself with up to 10 years of hard labor in the "pen" for crimes as small as loitering or not surrendering a sidewalk to a white person.

These "pens," like the infamously brutal Parchman Farm, 90 miles south of Memphis, right in the heart of "The Delta," weren't so much correctional facilities as they were businesses. "Convicts" provided strong, unpaid labor, watched over by Southern white, uneducated guards with shotguns. To pass the time during the dawn–to–night workday, the men sang, with their work of timbering, or railroad work, or other jobs providing a basic pulse.

Enter folklorist Alan Lomax. Lomax, and his father John, travelled all over the U.S. compiling the country's musical history, most of which lies in the South. Part of Rounder Records' "Alan Lomax Collection" series is the Prison Songs sub–series, a 2–volume, separately sold set of recordings from Parchman in the years 1947–48.

Volume 1: Murderous Home has such dramatic tracks, also beautiful in their rising/falling dynamics, harmony and syncopation, as "Old Alabama," and "Prettiest Train," led by the young convict nicknamed "22" (all prisoners named in these volumnes were nicknamed once they got into the "pen" and carried those names on when they got out, or, more commonly, if they made it out), whose high voice leads the chorus. "22" also leads the greatest of the songs, "Early In The Mornin'," with overlapping vocals and the greatest syncopation via axes chopping at a tree.

Many of the melodies on Volume 2: Don't You Hear Poor Mother Calling? echo those on Vol. 1, but have different lyrics. There are some that are truly original to Vol. 2, however, such as the subversively anti–white song, "Going Home," and the large a cappella sounds of "I'm Going To Memphis" and "Stewball." Both discs have portions of interviews Alan Lomax had with the convicts, mostly "Bama," the singer of "Going Home." Fifty years later, these songs paint a haunting portrait of what was basically slavery in the 20th century, as well as an important fraction of the blues.

Here in the '90s, we have a woman who has been around for 50 years on the blues and R&B circuit. Yes, the proclaimed "Queen Of Rhythm And Blues," Ruth Brown, has released a new album of songs she has performed over the course of her five–decade career, R+B=Ruth Brown (Bullseye/Rounder). With a large band featuring, among others, guitarist Duke Robillard and trombonist Delfeayo Marsalis, she exercises her still strong, yet sassy voice with Bonnie Raitt on "I'm Gonna Move To The Outskirts Of Town," and on her own on the '50s Doc Pomus–written sad tune, "Destination Heartbreak," and the urban blues duet with Johnny Adams on "I Don't Know." Yeah, she's still got it.

Recently, in the jazz stacks, a fairly new name that probably wouldn't ring too many bells, but will, is saxophonist/bandleader Greg Osby. His new album, Further Ado, on Blue Note, is a fine little disc full of be–bop oriented mid–size ensemble music. Many men play on this album, but besides Osby, Mark Moran, is another who truly sticks out on his piano. He keeps many songs alive with his jabbing chords and leads. Osby leads his band through the exotic, the fast–paced, and the serene. The building–up of the melody in "Transparency," and the polyrhythmic vamping of "The Mental" stick up above other tunes, especially.

The question of the week: Does all contemporary jazz have to sound like Kenny G? It all seems to sound like elevator music. I took a chance on the Italian saxophonist Amedeo Bianchi's latest The Rhythm Of Life (Pelago/Blue Note Contemporary). Bad move. G–city. The sax is way over–effected, synth strings carry the harmonic structure over even more heavily–effected drums. Sure, some modern electric jazz, like Medeski, Martin and Wood, and even Lenny White's Renderers Of Spirit from last year can actually be chill, funky, sincere. Amedeo, buddy, you might as well perm your hair now.

GEORGE CLINTON
John M. Greene Hall
Sept. 23

NORTHAMPTON — Waving his arms in his classic funk way, George Clinton and the P–Funk All–Stars put on a good show with plenty of dancing. Clinton and The P–Funk All– Stars played Monday night in Northampton's John M. Greene Hall. Clinton entered the auditorium through the back door, walking through the crowd to get to the stage, immediately immersing the crowd into his rhythm.

Clinton strolled in wearing a sheet with the characters form the Disney movie 101 Dalmatians. His signature colorful deadlocks where as "funky" as ever. Garry "Starchild" Shider, the other vocalist, and rhythm guitarist wore a baby diaper and a baseball cap with his name written on it in glitter. The band's aura of liveliness and excitement gushed over the audience. From the very beginning, Clinton involved everyone in the audience by addressing individual people and getting everyone to sing along.

Clinton told the audience, "I am not of this world... I am here to help you... Free your minds and the dance will follow."

Opening with "Let's Take It to the Stage," Clinton and the company led a packed house in a jovial chant of "We want the funk, gos to have the funk." There was not a foot in the hall that didn't pound to the beat as Clinton and his gang jammed and danced on stage.

Many of the songs that Clinton and The P–Funks played were from the album T.A.P.O.A.F.O.M., and the limit-

Bern to play Iron Horse tonight

Merrie Amsterburg will open show for the new "Dylan"

By Justin Beland
Collegian Staff

Dan Bern is his own man. Since he arrived on the folk scene, he has not been able to shake that pesky "new Dylan" moniker that frustrates so many new artists. However, the comparison doesn't do him justice, and many critics have given a more suitable nickname: The Real Deal.

Bern writes beautiful songs, both topical and otherwise, but in a more down–to–earth and more easily approachable style than Dylan used in the '60s. No subject is unapproachable, from spirituality to alien abductions to a fan's assault on tennis star Monica Seles — and everything in between. All his songs, no matter what the subject, are done with an astounding poetic power and subtle grace unseen in the folk world for quite some time. Bern's lyrics can raise your eyebrows and drop your jaw, often repeatedly in the same song.

Though he is just one man with a guitar, his range of style and sound is astonishingly diverse, making any sort of "style" hard to pigeonhole (another reason why the "new Dylan" title is inappropriate.) As Bern himself sings in his song "Jerusalem:" "Don't ask what kind of music I'm going to play tonight / just stay a while / hear for yourself awhile / and if you must put me in a box / make sure it's a big box."

This is Bern's third stop at the Iron Horse, and his first as a headliner. Many in the Valley will remember his show– stopping opening set for Ani Difranco at Smith College last year, in which a crowd of strangers to his music bought out all 600 five–song EPs he had with him shortly after his set. That's the kind of effect Bern has on a crowd— he rivets them in their seats and, though his perspective on things, presents extraordinarily memorable words and ideas. One minute you're laughing, the next you're in tears (he got a standing ovation from a crowd of 3,000 in Vancouver for his touching ballad about the Oklahoma City bombing, then proceeded to play a song about evolution called "Aliens Came and Fed the Monkey").

Bern's self–titled debut album on Sony/Work records mimics his brilliant stage performance, with the accompaniment of a full band behind him. Songs like "Marilyn," (which asks what would have happened had Marilyn Monroe married Henry instead of Arthur Miller) and "I'm Not the Guy" come off just as unique and catchy when Bern is on a stage. However, he is anything but limited to the material on his first (and only) album. Bern prides himself on writing one song a day, often performing in concert songs written just hours before.

No matter the size of the stage he graces, Bern always delivers.

Opening for Bern will be Merrie Amsterburg, who some may remember as the lead singer of the Boston–based band the Natives. Now gone solo and acoustic, Amsterburg plays touching acoustic rock in the Richard–Thompson–meets– Kate–Bush vein.

All told, it should be a terrific evening of music with one of today's unsung acoustic heroes.

Dan Bern will be playing Thursday night at 7 p.m. at the Iron Horse in Northampton. Merrie Amsterburg will be opening. Call the club at 584–0610 for more details.

Flipping flapjacks — Asian-style

I hope you all checked out and feasted on my previous recipe for Coca–Cola Steak! If you missed it and would like a copy, contact me and I'll gladly e–mail it to you.

As promised in my first installment, this week's recipe is for Coconut–Ginger Rice Pancake. This is a great Asian– influenced dish that I created on one of those days when I swore that there was "nothing to eat" in the house.

This dish can be served either as an accompaniment to a main course or as a great appetizer with a simple dipping sauce that I'll also tell you how to make.

Remember, as I always say, whenever and wherever you're cooking, think safety (and flavor) first. Always have a fire extinguisher close by and be sure to provide for proper ventilation. Rock and boil!

Coconut–Ginger Rice Pancakes

This dish can be prepared and served in a number of ways. The technique below involves a couple steps but is by far the most simple. It yields pancakes with a browned, crispy exterior and a moist and flavorful center.

Ingredients:
- 1 1/4 cups short or medium grain rice
- 2 tsp. salt
- 2 tsp. sugar
- 2 Tbs. cider or distilled white vinegar
- 2 cups water
- 1 can unsweetened coconut milk (shaken very well before opening). Do not use the Pepe Lopez Pina Colada mix stuff!
- 3 large eggs, beaten
- 1/4 cup unsweetened (preferably), dried and grated or sweetened coconut
- 2 stalks green onion (scallion), finely chopped
- 2 tsp. powdered ginger
- 1 tsp. white pepper
- salt to taste
- Butter (or olive oil) as needed for sautéing.

For dipping sauce:
- 1 garlic clove, peeled, crushed and minced
- 4 Tbs. soy sauce
- 2 Tbs. Worcestershire sauce
- 2 Tbs. white vinegar
- 4 Tbs. lime juice
- 2 Tbs. sugar
- 1 scallion, green part only, sliced thinly into rounds
- 1/2 tsp. red pepper flakes (more or less to taste).

Add rice, salt, sugar, vinegar and water to sauce pan and bring to a boil over high heat on a burner. Stir this mixture once, turn the burner to low and allow the rice to come to a simmer (just bubbling). Cover the pan and leave it alone to cook for exactly 17 minutes.

Remove pan from heat. Remove cover and fluff the rice gently, preferably with a wooden spoon, but whatever utensil you have available. Allow the rice to cool completely before proceeding with the rest of the recipe.

In a mixing bowl (or in the now cold rice pan), combine the cooked rice and the rest of the ingredients (except the butter/oil) and mix well to form a batter.

Pre–heat a frying pan or griddle (non–stick works great) over a medium to medium–high heat.

Add enough butter to coat the bottom of the pan. When it starts to bubble, add the batter with a spoon or a ladle and form into rounds as large or small as you like.

After about 1 1/2 to two minutes, with a spatula check to see if the bottom of the pancake has browned to your liking. If so, gently flip it over and brown the second side.

These pancakes can be kept warm in a toaster oven set on low or they can be served at room temperature.

To make the dipping sauce, combine all the ingredients together and blend well until sugar has completely dissolved.

Serving Suggestion

If using as an accompaniment to a main dish, serve these warm with the entree and its sauce presented on top of them. As an appetizer, make the pancakes large and thin and slice them into wedges arranged around the bowl of dipping sauce. The number of servings depends upon the size of the pancakes you create, but this will feed a lot of people. The uncooked batter will keep refrigerated for three to four days (although it might get a bit dense in which case you can just add some milk to adjust the consistency).

Women activists celebrate 25 years

Today marks the start of the UMass Women Activists Reunion. From today until Sunday, there will be various workshops, lectures and music to celebrate nearly 30 years of women activists in Amherst. Developed by the Everywoman's Center, the Women's Studies Program, and the Faculty Staff Council on the Status of Women, the weekend will be a celebration of "25 years of women of vision in action." These three programs have been working together since the 1970s to further the resources available to women in the five-college area.

The Women Activists Reunion is designed to bring together UMass activists past and present, as well as family members, friends, and interested students. The great "bratty chatter" debate

Laura Barcella

I have always liked to expose my friends to music that's important to me. Not shocking, since most people pick up on bands through their friends. Although this is usually a noble way of expressing my tastes, I admit to taking slight gratification in knowing it annoys the heck out of certain others.

My favorite target for music–pushing is a dear "acquaintance" whom we will call Id (short for "Idiot"). Id is a boy from Long Island who has an affinity for New York hardcore and British pop music. Although he has a decent range of musical tastes, he claims to find my female–based music collection to be redundant and slight. Or, as he often calls it, in a voice dripping with self–satisfaction, "bratty chatter."

We debate often about the artistic merit behind many such girl groups, particularly ones in the Olympia, Wash. punk scene such as Bratmobile, Sleater–Kinney, and Bikini Kill. Such arguments often get pretty heated.

A recent argument was sparked after Id agreed with a heinous comment made by Juliana Hatfield (Alt–pop–lite extraordinaire, of Blake Babies and "My Sister" fame) in Rolling Stone's Book of Women in Rock. Hatfield said, "I can't think of one woman in rock doing anything really great, but I don't think it's because people don't let them. Men just play better than women. I think maybe it's genetic. We have one hormone missing."

What follows is the debate between Id and me after reading Hatfield's comment.

Id: I'm not saying girls have no place in music. It's just that girls are better at some things than others.

L: So you're saying that one of the things girls aren't better at is playing music.

Id: It's no coincidence they tend to stick to vocals and keyboards. Oh, and now and again they're allowed to play the bass guitar, because it's not very complicated.

L: The only reason there are so many women vocalists is that we've been told it's all we can excel at in rock. It takes more guts for a woman to decide she's going to be a guitar player. It's a cause for celebration when a girl decides she's going to play the guitar or the drums. Those are male–oriented fields. Punk music in general is a male–oriented field.

Id: These bands that you assault me with are only doing what male bands did 20 years ago—the Kinks, the Ramones, the Buzzcocks. There's no "celebration." They're merely repeating an old scene, and not very well.

L: Back then there was even less acceptance for women in general, much less in music. The primary genres women have been praised for exploring are folk and mindless dance– pop. Folk music is soft and pretty—it might be lyrically strong but there's not much physical aggression involved. People want to hear women being quiet, strumming softly and singing pretty. It's great that it's all changing now. Just the act of a girl deciding she's going to play drums, then actually playing them, is an act of independence and rebellion. It proves not only that we can do it, but that we want to do it.

Id: Look, I'll be the first to appreciate women who are forging new ground, but this scene is doing nothing new. Plus, as far as I've seen, many women can't handle drums or guitar competently.

L: At this point the music world has heard most everything, and not much is fresh or shocking anymore. Still, there is an undoubtedly "new" element to women doing punk music, because it hasn't been fully explored or appreciated in the past.

Id: The drums and guitar in many of the female punk bands tend to be sloppy and uncoordinated. It's not that I want to believe this, it's just what I've observed.

L: I'd rather hear music with real meaning and passion behind it than some formulaic, testosterone–fueled mindless ranting. Besides, at least we have reason to rant. (Chuckle.) We haven't really been able to in the past.

Id: Maybe… but when breaking new ground, do it right or don't do it at all. Women who sound like second–rate high school bands aren't doing much for the women's movement as a whole. But for your argument, the New York hardcore band Shift was in Worcester a couple weeks ago, and the female drummer was amazing. She was one of the best drummers I've seen.

L: So you concede. Women rock the house.

Who's afraid of the F word?

Laura Barcella

Feminism: what is it, and why are people afraid of it? The Webster's New World Dictionary defines feminism as "the principle that women should have political, economic, and social rights equal to those of men."

Most intelligent people have an idea what the fuss is about—why women have a right to be angry, why it is time for women to demand standards of living as high as a man's. Most people can understand, to some degree, the value of feminist thought and action. It makes sense that after countless years of oppression, alienation, and de– valuing, many women want to use their long–stifled voices to begin to set change in motion at this very moment.

Feminism makes sense. Women of all ages, shapes, colors and backgrounds have been negatively affected by the misogynistic society we inhabit—a society which won't let a woman walk down the street in peace. A society which expects a woman to look 16 until she's in her grave. A society which thrives on a woman's insecurities and scoffs at her unhappiness. A society which labels a woman who (gasp!) enjoys sex, a "slut," and a woman who prefers other pursuits as "frigid" or "prudish." A society which thinks it's always her fault, the woman is always lying.

Despite the contempt expressed towards women in our society, feminism is still considered a bad word. The amount of women willing to use the word "feminist" to describe themselves is alarmingly low.

It's a well–known theory that men resent feminism because they feel threatened by the possibility of female dominance. Yet why are women afraid to classify themselves as feminists? Why do so many women fear a word which represents a movement designed to protect their integrity, security, health and well–being?

It seems that male–dominated society's perception of feminism has affected many women's consciousness. Thus, many women are reluctant to describe themselves in what others see as an unpleasant light. The stereotypical feminist is not a pretty girl. She has most of the traits women are taught to repress in themselves from an early age. The stereotypical feminist is physically unattractive, "masculine" in appearance and manner (with the requisite hairy armpits and unshaven legs), man–hating, angry, forceful and defensive. She is aggressive yet paranoid, and she is never satisfied. She is everything deemed "unfeminine," therefore unacceptable to society (and sexually unattractive to men).

Laura Barcella

The fear of rejection for not living up to societal standards is, I believe, what makes many women hesitant to associate themselves with feminism. What we (women) should remember is why acceptance is unimportant in the first place. Why bother trying to impress a society which won't be satisfied with your behavior or appearance unless it fits into a rigid definition of "the feminine"—the feminine always meaning small, irrelevant, and controllable. There's simply not enough space in that tiny box for me, or you, to fit into.

The devil finds work for idle hands to do

Sissy Andrews

What could I mean when I say that modern American society is killing me? How dare I bite at the hand that has fed me, from state–of–the–art refrigerators to microwaves and Nintendo? Such "necessities" have coaxed me into blindly forfeiting the simple, peaceful balance I should be experiencing in my life.

Granted, there is an argument that modern life is natural because humans created it, and humankind is natural. However, I have observed that as our great benefactors overseas ship us the latest gadgets to make our lives easier and more entertaining, my life actually grows emptier, leading me to subconsciously react.

I am reminded of the Dead Kennedys' song "I Kill Children," which refers to the fact that America has a higher rate of psychopaths and serial killers per capita than any other country. Could this, coincidentally, be related to the ugly truth that America is a consumer nation through and through, with our luxury cars, cellular telephones, and huge indoor shopping malls? Heaven forbid we ever grow our own food or walk a couple of miles, much less use a rotary phone!

As Morrissey once sang, "The devil will find work for idle hands to do." People resort to violence, drug abuse and other forms of social deviance because there is no sense of importance or worth in their lives. Now and again we get a war or other disaster which briefly unites the general populous, getting people to work for a cause, yet most of the time we are a lazy, robotic nation, and we would rather watch the disaster on television that go out to help fix it.

I have noticed that in a hometown high school where all the rich snooty kids go, where Beemers and Hummers populate the student parking lot, the level of heroin abuse is suspiciously high. What?

It is logical, really. Pamper a kid his or her entire life, shelter them from the unsightly, unpleasant elements of the world (hard work, sweat) and watch their collision course with disaster—depression, drugs, alcohol, violence, you name it.

I am certainly not saying that running around the block a couple times will help. Still, the greatest pleasures in life must be earned... or so I've heard. Sweat never killed anyone, though I suspect being completely removed from nature has. I too am secure in my lazy existence. Change and effort threaten me. Yet there has to be a breaking point, and I sense it's not far off... at least for me.

De La Soul & KRS–One team up for NoHo concert

By Adam Dlugacz
Collegian Staff

"Whoo Whoo That's The Sound Of The Police," "Me, Myself, And I," "One, Two, Three, The Crew Is Called BDP," or maybe "Ego Trip, Ego Trip." The question shouldn't be whether or not you are going to see KRS–One and De La Soul at Smith College on Saturday night, the question is who is going to outshine who.

In every genre of music there are good artists, great artists, and artists that define a genre. KRS–One is the God of hip– hop and De La Soul has redefined hip–hop on every album, in other words they're guaranteed to give you whiplash.

When Boogie Down Productions first emerged on the scene in the early '80s they managed to merge the politics of Public Enemy with the fun party mood that groups like the Sugar Hill Gang made famous. While BDP was a crew there was no doubt that KRS–One was the ringleader. Not only did BDP enlighten you, they also made you want to dance.

After BDP ended and KRS–One began his solo career, he quickly rose to the top of the scene. Whether he was creating anthems about the police or slaying fellow MCs he was always banging. As soon as you heard KRS–One's mighty baritone you knew to pick your head up and start listening. He educated you about the state of hip–hop and the state of politics at the same time. His last album I Got Next's single "Step Into The World" put a strangle hold on the number one spot on the billboard charts. While other MCs were pre–occupied with smoking blunts, being playaz or pimps, or killing each other, KRS–One simply dropped knowledge. So go and learn from the teacher.

From the beginning. De La Soul were on their own tip. Their first album had pictures of flowers on it and they were called the hippies of the hip hop movement — not that everyone didn't sweat that album anyway.

While De La Soul has come far and in some sense returned to straight up hip hop with their last album Stakes Is High, they were always on their own tip. They eschewed what was popular for what was good, simple and plain. They dissed R and B, phony MCs, but always kept it on the positive side of things.

So when you're partying at Smith College on Saturday night remember you are watching two of the innovators and leaders of hip hop. KRS–One and De La Soul aren't keepin it real, they're keepin it right.

KRS–One and De La Soul will be performing in John M. Green Hall at Smith College in Northampton on Saturday Sept. 27. Tickets are $12 in advance. Doors open at 8 p.m..

Audience gives Bela Fleck standing ovation

BELA FLECK & THE FLECKTONES Academy Of Music
Sept. 21

NORTHAMPTON — One of the most innovative groups of the 1990s showed up at Northampton's own Academy Of Music on Sunday night in a sold–out performance. Bela Fleck, the man from New York City who has singlehandedly redefined the role of the banjo (generally a hillbilly instrument), led his band, comprised of virtuousic and inventive musiciant, to many musical crescendos. Both young and old in the crowd bade Fleck & The Flecktones "adieu" with a standing ovation after it was all over.

In the breadth of the show, Fleck switched between acoustic and electric banjos, with some fancy MIDI effects applied to the latter, which Fleck was quite happy to show off throughout the night with a smirk on his face. Victor Wooten's bass playing dropped so many chins on the floor, the microphone trees that were taping the show could pick up the thud.

Roy "Future Man" Wooten's "Synth–axe drumitar" and his other electronic percussion inventions kept interest level music high. Special guest saxophonist and flautist Jeff Coffin joined the band for most numbers, switching between smooth and funky styles on both instruments.

The first set highlights included a brand new piece, "Oddity," which was seasoned with an almost Spanish flavor in the tones. The flute helped that along. Victor Wooten's bass solo featured his bass–only version of The Beatles' "Norwegian Wood" with also a "Nutcracker Suite" quote. His mastery of the harmonics and overtones of the electric bass have qualified him as one of the greatest bassists in the world. He has been chosen as Best Bassist by Bass Player magazine (1993), and received top honors at the Nashville Music Awards last year.

The second set began with only the Future Man playing some acoustic and sampled sounds. He was sitting on, and beating with his hands and feet, a square drum, that looked almost like a storage chest, made by a member of the audience for him. The whole band came out and performed a few numbers, one of which was "Huckleberry Row," which they described as "12–tone music," giving the crowd a bit of a music lesson, especially when they actually counted the tones of the melody (by Jeff Coffin) for the audience. Future Man lent his light, soulful vocals to the tune "Trouble In Strife."

Continuing with the solo distribution, Fleck performed alone, acoustically for a little while before the whole band joined him for a very nice acoustic mini–set. Wooten played cello, Coffin played flute, and Future Man played acoustic hand–drums. They left the stage after a couple of Middle Eastern/Brazilian–sounding tunes for only a moment before returning for the encore.

"The Sinister Minister" was funky, and a crowd favorite. It also won a Grammy award recently for Best Bluegrass Performance. Coffin's soprano sax wailed through an energetic solo, and Wooten took another hard–slapping solo, spanning his bass all around, and then playing some deep– down beats with his brother, the Future Man. The band closed the show out to another loud applause. Northampton let some of their favorite visitors vanish into the night, hoping for a return in the near future.

ed release album Dope Dogs. However, they did play from a few of their other albums. "Flashlight," "Booty," "Mothership Connection," "Hard as Steel" and "Free Your Mind (and Your Ass Will Follow)" were just a few of the songs played.

"Booty" was one of the evening's many highlights. Everyone in the crowd sang along and, if the words weren't known, participated by dancing. Tracey "Trey Lewd" Lewis, the group's rapper, had the crowd in stitches with lines like "When I go to Med School I want to be a booty doctor." The song's beat was one that even the most unrhythmic person could dance to.

Another of the evening's focal points was the incredible solo by Greg Thomas, on the saxophone, Benuie Cowan, on the trumpet, Randy Skinner, on the trumpet and Scott Taylor, on the saxophone during "Flashlight." The electrifying jazz style these four men put fourth was of great satisfaction to the audience who were left screaming for more.

When Clinton left the stage to change, DeWayne "Blackbyrd" McKnight on lead guitar and Michael "Kid Funkadelic" Hampton, also on lead guitar, took center stage. With their ripping chords and unspeakable talent they brought the house down.

All in all, the night was one that will not be forgotten by anyone in attendance in the near future.

Venice hosts exhibition of German Expressionists

By Daniel J. Wakin
Associated Press

VENICE, Italy — The 18th–century Palazzo Grassi has become a dark corner of angst amid the shimmering canals and airy facades of Venice.

A major show of German Expressionist painters opened this month at the exhibition space, one of the most comprehensive surveys of the period ever presented in Italy.

Not since the 1960s has such an exhibition been seen in this country, where not a single significant German Expressionist painting hangs in a museum, according to co–curator Stephanie Barron.

"I think it is a reflection of history," she said, pointing to the "historical residue" of anti–German feeling dating to World War II.

The paintings are survivors of what the Nazis called degenerate art. Hitler's regime in the 1930s removed Expressionist works from museums and forbade their sale or critical discussion of them

"German Expressionism: Art and Society" features works by Max Beckmann, Otto Dix, George Grosz, Ernst Ludwig Kirchner, Oskar Kokoschka and 19 other artists who flourished in the first quarter of the 20th century.

The show is divided into themes — paintings reflecting melancholy, life in the alienating city, the horrors of World War I, optimism that the leftist uprisings after the war would change things, resignation that the same old hypocrisy of bourgeois values would remain.

The German Expressionists, spiritual heirs of Munch, van Gogh, Ensor and Gauguin, invested their works with dramatic colors, grotesque figures, biting sarcasm and gloom in a transformation of reality to convey individual psychology.

"German Expressionism would be unthinkable without Freud," Ms. Barron, senior curator of 20th–century art at the Los Angeles County Museum, said in an interview.

"There's a fierceness, an intensity, a cynicism which is certainly in contrast to a kind of Italian sensibility as we know it through Italian art."

The exhibition seeks to place the 250 paintings, sculptures and graphic works in the context of society. In one display, period photographs and film footage is juxtaposed with slides of the paintings. The paintings span the period 1905–1923, and come from 50 museums and collections.

The art of the romantic tango

By Mary Campbell
Associated Press

NEW YORK — At 55, most professional dancers are long retired.

But Carlos Gavito, the oldest of the 16 dancers appearing on Broadway in Forever Tango, is not only still dancing at 55, but he also gets the best reviews of anyone else in the company.

When that is mentioned, Gavito says modestly, "I have more past to look back on."

He adds that his dancing is slower than it used to be. "Maybe when you grow up, you have not the ability to move that fast. You have another kind of energy — experience, maturity. You produce intensity from the inside."

Still, Gavito rather longingly recalls the past. "I was fast like a cheetah when I was young," he says.

Forever Tango, a show of sensual dance, instrumental music and no plot, opened at the Walter Kerr Theater on June 16 for two months and has proved so popular it's being extended into January. The main idea behind Forever Tango, says Luis Bravo, who had the idea and directed it, was to show the real Argentine tango.

Tango originally was music only. Then dance steps began to add their own unique expression of the music. So there are some non-dance numbers in the show, which features an 11-piece orchestra on stage, a singer and players of the bandoneon, which looks like a small accordion.

"The tango is difficult to describe — like love," Gavito says. "The dancers try to paint on the floor what the music describes for them. It's more than a dance. The tango is a feeling which we dance.

"The music is so heavy, so deep. I can close my eyes and I can dance without thinking what I have to do, just feel it. Tango has been my life in a way. I've been very much always living tango."

The dance, Bravo says, is improvised, not choreographed. Its style changed as it went from Argentine brothels, to Paris where vacationing Argentinians took it, to its socially accepted return to Argentina. Bravo wants to show all the styles of this living, still-changing art.

"Innovations come from the younger dancers," Gavito says. "The older dancers dance the past and they dance the future."

"Ellen" finally find its way entering a fifth season

By Frazier Moore
Associated Press

NEW YORK — "Ellen" is neither a cure for cancer nor, as its fiercest critics have charged, a cancer good people need protection from.

Instead, with its fifth-season opener, "Ellen" has earned the right to be judged as neither more nor less than a TV series. Not a righteous crusade, not a video Gomorrah, "Ellen" emerges as a sitcom that, after years of trial-and-error, may finally have found its way — a way that happens to distinguish it as the first TV series in history with a gay lead.

"You sure look happy," a past boyfriend tells Ellen Morgan after learning she's come out as a lesbian.

"Yes," she quips in her goofy-deadpan fashion, "and the best part about it is, it's taken five strokes off my golf game."

But she really does look happy in the season premiere, titled "Guys or Dolls." Moreover, star Ellen DeGeneres finally looks happy in the role she's been grappling with, unsuccessfully until now, ever since "Ellen" premiered in March 1994.

In sum, "Ellen" has not so much "come out" as come in — come into its own, at long last, as a funny, newly grounded sitcom.

Of course, it ended last season not so much a TV series as a lightning rod in a storm of public outbursts over homosexuality.

For months before, the show and its star had been building toward that truly must-see-TV moment when Ellen Morgan blurted "I'm gay" over an airport public-address system. Thunderous media coverage leading to that season finale included a Time cover story where DeGeneres confirmed that she, too, was gay.

Thus had "Ellen" ridden a wave of controversy that, in turn, drove a wider debate about being gay, culminating in publicity overkill at a feverish pitch: By "Ellen's" air-time April 30, many viewers were as weary of the whole thing as they were incapable of talking about anything else.

But even carrying all that freight, the so-called "Puppy Episode" was generally recognized as being genuinely funny (and would win the Emmy for best-written comedy script).

Then, rather quickly, it was over. The world turned to the next thing.

But whither "Ellen"? Come fall, could it pick up where it left off so spectacularly in the spring? DeGeneres, for one, didn't seem to know, and apparently wasn't sure she even wanted to find out.

She was quoted as saying she hoped her series wouldn't be back.

Then, to no one's surprise (surely least of all her own), it was renewed. And now available evidence suggests that, rather than reaching an end, "Ellen" has scored a rebirth. "Guys or Dolls" positions "Ellen" for the first time as a series for us to watch faithfully, or, at least, to keep our eye on.

In this episode, Ellen has run into her old boyfriend Dan, who, learning that she's gay, naturally frets that he is somehow accountable for her sexual orientation.

"Well, no," she saucily assures him, "not unless you played Catwoman on 'Batman.' "

Finding they still enjoy each other's company, Dan and Ellen pal around. Then a friendly good-night kiss turns into something more than friendly.

Ellen, alarmed that her hard-won self-realization is coming undone, confides to her gay friend Peter her unexpected pull in Dan's direction.

"You have to follow your heart, and it will lead you to the truth of the matter," Peter counsels, before tripping into his own disclosure: He once had a liaison with a woman.

"You didn't!"

"Oh, Ellen," he hastens to explain, "I was in college! It was a crazy time! Devo was hot!"

The episode concludes in an amusing encounter with Dan, as Ellen satisfies herself that she feels affection, but no sexual spark, for this man — or any other.

"I'm gay, I'm a gay woman," she tells him, "and kissing boys kind of violates the whole spirit of the thing."

Be true to yourself and be honest with others. There, we have the episode's message. Daring? Groundbreaking? Shocking? Scandalous? On the contrary.

This "Ellen" vouches for some pretty old-fashioned values. It's funny how that works.

A peek at upcoming television attractions

"DHARMA & GREG:" With her rabbity grin and peekaboo midriff, Jenna Elfman has a certain sexuality. But even if her new sitcom launches her as a star, you might still mourn accurately call it "Dharma & Dregs," yet another romantic comedy about a mixed marriage and a culture clash.

In this case, she's a hippie-dippie free spirit, whereas her soul mate Greg (Thomas Gibson) is a conservative assistant U.S. attorney, and a wealthy blue-blood to boot. What, besides sheer randiness, would possess such an apparent stick-in-the-mud as Greg to fall for such an airhead as Dharma?

Meanwhile, what does Dharma see in this young fuddy-duddy? "Dharma & Greg" premieres Wednesday on ABC at 8:30 p.m. Unless we can get it annulled first.

Barbara Mandrell always fit best on television. And now she's giving up the concert stage to pursue an acting career.

Mandrell, who pulled the plug on her hit NBC variety series 15 years ago, makes a cameo appearance Sept. 28 in the CBS made for television movie "Get to the Heart: The Barbara Mandrell Story," based on her 1990 autobiography. Maureen McCormick ("The Brady Bunch") stars as Mandrell. In the past few years, Mandrell has acted on television when not on the road performing 80-100 shows a year. She's appeared in "Dr. Quinn Medicine Woman," "Touched by an Angel," "Baywatch" and has a recurring role on "Sunset Beach."

Cold enough for ya, eh?
Steve MacKinnon hopes to lead the Minutemen in their upcoming season starting in 24 days.

Finally, the AFC may look A-OK

By Dave Goldberg
Associated Press

Is this finally the year the AFC ends its 13-year drought at the Super Bowl?

It's much too early to make an assessment after four weeks of a 17-week regular season. Who knows what woes might befall the teams that look so good now?

But so far the AFC is stronger at the top than it has been in years, perhaps since the Raiders gave the conference its last NFL title after the 1983 season.

Start with New England and Denver — the AFC champion and the team that should have been. Both are 4-0 and neither has really been challenged. The Broncos' 38-20 win over the Bengals on Sunday was close for three quarters, the tightest game Denver has played this year.

Add Jacksonville, which made it to the title game last year as the third team at the top. And look at some upstarts, notably Kansas City, which went to Charlotte on Sunday and trounced Carolina, an NFC finalist last year, 35-14. One measure of the Chiefs: their only loss was 19-3 on opening day in Denver. Other than Tampa Bay (4-0), the teams at the top of the NFC are flawed. Green Bay is a shaky 3-1 and could be 1-3. Dallas and San Francisco, the aging dinosaurs, are dangerous but not invincible. "It was a lesson," Packers coach Mike Holmgren said after Green Bay squandered a 31-7 halftime lead and held on to beat the Vikings 38-32.

But how many lessons can a team learn? Holmgren insists the year after winning a championship is always the hardest — the offseason is shorter, the team is a target and good luck can turn to bad. So even while the Packers have more depth than most teams in the salary cap era, the injuries are showing (good luck turning to bad).

Dorsey Levens is carrying the running back load without Edgar Bennett, and even this early complains about wearing down. Craig Newsome, like Bennett gone for the season, is missed at cornerback — the Vikings picked on Tyrone Williams and Roderick Mullen at will in the second half on Sunday.

It looks as if the Buccaneers are serious challengers to the Packers in the NFC Central. We'll know more after they visit Green Bay in two weeks. When Warrick Dunn can't beat you running (11 carries for 17 yards Sunday night in the 31-21 win over Miami), he'll beat you catching (six for 106 yards) and Mike Alstott will run (18 carries for 95 yards).

And the defense, even without Warren Sapp, is solid.

"We're not as bad as we were tonight," Tony Dungy said by way of apology, even though two of Miami's three touchdowns came after the Dolphins trailed 24-7 in the third quarter.

Beyond the Packers and Bucs?

The Cowboys are an enigma — great against Pittsburgh, awful the next two — and rumors that Jerry Jones wants to coach only add to the continuing chaos.

San Francisco is 3-1 because it plays in a division with New Orleans and Atlanta, two of the NFL's worst, plus St. Louis, a young team not ready to challenge. Without Jerry Rice in the playoffs, trouble looms. Then again, Rice says he'll be back in time.

Right now, the Broncos and the Patriots, who meet in two weeks on a Monday night in Mile High Stadium, are the class of the league. They are averaging more than 30 points a game and allowing precious few (13 a game by Denver, 10 a game by New England). Yes, the schedule gets harder, particularly for the Patriots following their week off. But look at it another way. If the winners of the Green Bay-Tampa Bay and New England-Denver games were fast-forwarded to the Super Bowl, the AFC team probably would be favored.

neither one was allowed to get anything going, even though at the end of the game their numbers looked respectable.

The Pats have this whole weekend off to work out the kinks before heading to Mile High Stadium.

They'll need it.

In other NFL news:

When I looked at New England's schedule this year a few games popped out at me — the Jets games, obviously. Also, Monday night at Denver, Monday night versus Green Bay, an AFC Championship rematch against Jacksonville in week No. 15, and the last regular season game of the year — Monday night at Miami.

However, after four weeks have been completed, one game is blinking like a neon sign on 42nd street.

Week No. 12 — Nov. 16, New England at Tampa Bay.

The Buccaneers (4-0) are on a hot streak cooked up by my fantasy football sleeper, Warrick Dunn, who's carrying the team with 416 total yards. Trent Dilfer is the highest rated quarterback in the NFC. I don't believe it, but that's what the stats say.

Come week No. 12, this could be a sneak preview of the Super Bowl. But, I don't want to get ahead of myself. The Bucs haven't done well since... forever. If they suddenly started to suck, no one would care or be surprised.

Except for all those bandwagon hoppers who have dumped tons of money on Tampa's new apparel. It's too much like San Francisco's.

This Sunday, Tampa Bay invites the 1–2 Arizona Cardinals to Florida for an early afternoon supper. If the Bucs want to head into Green Bay next week on the right track, this game against the Cards better look like a Nebraska–Bowling Green match-up. Tampa Bay 77, Cardinals –10.

•Marc Brunell has proven to be one of the few athletes that actually earns every penny he makes. This guy took a shot to the knee during the preseason and should probably have been out of action for a couple of more weeks. Instead, he chooses to get into the game on Monday night, rough it out and help try and lead his Jaguars back to the AFC Championship game. Even with Rob Johnson and Steve Matthews getting the job done in the QB position, Brunell throws himself back into the lineup and wins a big Monday night divisional match–up over Pittsburgh, 30–21.

Against the Steelers, Brunell went 24 for 42 with no interceptions and 306 total yards. No matter how you look at it, he's back and the Jags are still undefeated.

This Sunday, Jacksonville travels up to Washington D.C. to take on the Redskins. I'm sorry, Marc, after a week of rest and a big win over Arizona the week before, I'm going with the Skins in a close defensive game. Washington 17, Jacksonville 10.

•Baltimore is at San Diego this weekend...

I figure somebody has got to care about this game.

I'll take the Ravens, 31–23.

•I wonder how long it will take Joe Bugel to realize that having Jeff George throw every pass to Tim Brown isn't winning football games. Brown leads the league with 33 receptions, 535 receiving yards and four touchdowns. However, the fabulous Raiders defense has given up just as many points as its offense has put up on the board (106). No matter which way you slice it, Oakland is just 1–3. They should pick up their second win of the season over St. Louis this weekend. However, the Rams are 2–2, with wins over New Orleans and the New York Giants. This match–up between the Rams and Raiders could be one of the best games of the weekend. Not.

I'll take Oakland, 38–31.

Jaguars hit hard

JACKSONVILLE, Fla. (AP) — Look at the Jacksonville Jaguars in their teal uniforms: a smashmouth team in the Sun Belt.

"We want our team to be strong on the offensive and defensive lines and we've done a pretty good job of assembling the kind of people that we think put us in that category," coach Tom Coughlin said as the Jaguars got ready for Monday night's game with the Pittsburgh Steelers. "We think they're the strong points of our team."

That northern approach to football has made the Jacksonville-Pittsburgh rivalry, just 2 years old, into one that could become one of the NFL's most intense. For if the Pittsburgh team assembled by Bill Cowher resembles the old "Steel Curtain" Super Bowl winners of two decades ago, the Jaguars reflect Coughlin's background.

Corporate sponsorship invades Buffalo territory

We aren't entirely sure down here in Collegian land, but my housemate who's actually old enough to remember hearing the phrase "new from Lynyrd Skynyrd... this is Free Bird" thinks that it was Black Sabbath who coined the phrase "sold our soul to Rock n' Roll."

Homer Simpson might sell his soul for a doughnut; Monday Night Football producers for any team that can actually kick a fourth quarter field goal; Milli Vanilli for a job; Republicans for a clue; a horny, pimply-faced freshmen for a 24-hour Jenny McCarthy network on HSCN; or the lovely Miss Ralls of Collegian fame for a night with the Big E. Not the fair, Eric Lindros you dingbat.

Regardless, the University of Colorado has sold its soul to the All-Mighty swoosh. The folks in Boulder might be raking it in hand over fist, but they're not free as a bird now, and this bird you can change.

Nike holds the right to, amongst other things, change the school's popular Buffalo logo or black and gold colors. This is hardly a load of Boulder-dash or Buffalo chips.

One person from CU recently joked to me (I hope) that they might someday even become the University of Nike at Boulder, just one of about 20 branches across the country. Apparently the school could keep the "Boulder" just so it isn't confused with sattelite campuses like UN-Chapel Hill, UN-Gainesville or UN-Tallahassee.

Leigh Torbin

When students want an identifying mark, they might do something silly like piercing their tongue or getting a new tattoo. Athletic Directors put three stripes, a swoosh, that Reebok thing, or what ever other logo they can put on their football jerseys.

For the companies, there's a certain prestige in being an official sponsor. Some shoe company named adidas — a German company that feels no need to adhere to conventional English by capitalizing its name (oooh, they're soooo cool!), recently paid $95 million over 10 years to be the offical shoe of Yankee Stadium.

I think it's a size 17,281EEEE.

Of course there is one good thing. This makes it the official shoe of Steinbrenner, so when he makes his monthly manager firing, he'll have an "adidas" tatooed on his ass when the Boss boots him coldly out onto 161rd Street to die like John McClain in Die Hard 3.

Last Saturday of course was a fair day for the UN system on the gridiron when going head to head against various branches of the Ua (University of adidas) system. In two of the most heavily anticipated games of the year UN– Gainesville welcomed the Ua–Knoxville to The Swamp, while UN–Seattle hosted Ua–Lincoln.

UN pulled off a big win in Florida, but Ua evened the score with a solid win in the Pacific Northwest. Now the two showcase schools of each University system square off Saturday on national TV.

When UN–Ann Arbor and Ua–South Bend do battle, Keith Jackson will be calling the Wolverines and Catholics from The Big House, but by the game's end, it might get mistaken for Lions and Christians from the Roman Coliseum with Bo Schembechler as Julius Caeser.

In recent weeks, the Reebok schools haven't been as wise in their non–intra–University system scheduling. While UN and Ua each gained. UR found itself in a lose–lose situation with its scheduling. Anything Reebok's Los Angeles campus gained two weeks ago UR simultaneously lost, and then some, as one of its most prominent satellite schools, UR– Austin, was embarrassed at home 66–3 by URLA.

UMass women's soccer and softball are proudly representives of UR–Amherst. So much so that at women's soccer games, senior Ben Thaler goes existential. Just as Clark Kent becomes Superman and Bruce Wayne becomes Batman, Thaler transformes into the newest super hero...Reebokman! Coach Jim Rudy has a sweet deal with the swoosh's idea of a villian, and he isn't bashful in his rumbling promotions.

Some might say that It's only a logo so why the big fuss? Journalism professors tell it differently. The swoosh and Reebok thingie are symbolic speech and mean everything. But, of course, the shoes themselves will occasionally count more than the dollars.

I knew this lovely red-headed lady who always wore these navy blue Nikes. Then the man tried to put Reeboks on a laid–back country music lovin' type. Last I heard she had moved to Boulder. Where she's now I don't know.

Must've been the shoes.

Bucaneers, Ravens top list in Week 4

79 yards.

That's it.

That's all Curtis Martin was able to rush for against the "Bad News" Chicago Bears (0–4) — on 14 carries, to top it off. Take away his late 70 yard run and you have nine yards on 13 carries. Doesn't anyone know that just like Barry Sanders, it usually takes Martin about 10 to 15 carries just to get into a groove? And the Pats (4–0) just let him touch it 14 times. Sure, he leads the NFL with 567 total yards, but just think how many he would have if New England would just give him the ball.

Jonathan M. Place

I know it's tough to give it to the running back all the time when you have a quarterback like Drew Bledsoe and amazing receivers, but Martin's one of the top rushers in the league. Use him.

Denver (4–0) has John Elway throwing the ball and Terrell Davis still picked up 215 yards this past weekend against Cincinnati.

I don't blame Pete Carroll. He doesn't control the offense, but if things don't change, I may turn against him.

If it wasn't for the defense, I don't know where the Patriots would be right now. The offensive play selection for the Pats sucked on Sunday, and if they don't watch out, Denver will walk all over them on October 6. They have to allow either Bledsoe or Martin to get into a groove. Either one can carry the team to a victory. Against the Bears,

Minutewomen stick Rhode Island with 5–0 loss

LAUREN KOSKY/COLLEGIAN

UMass junior Kate Putnam leads the charge past the Rams yesterday.

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

Erica Johnston leads the Atlantic 10 in goals and points. Not surprisingly, she also leads her team — the Massachusetts field hockey team — in the same categories. She has been named conference player of the week already, and the season isn't even three weeks old.

Yesterday at Richard F. Garber Field, Johnston demonstrated the skills that have earned her those accolades, as the Minutewomen (4–4, 1–0 Atlantic 10) defeated winless Rhode Island, 5–0.

In the first half alone, the junior forward would not give URI goalie Jackie Pizzi a break. In a 15–minute span in the first half, Johnston racked up a pair of goals on shots close to Pizzi.

RI	0

With 19:37 remaining in the half, Johnston retrieved the ball on a scramble in front of the Ram net. Fellow junior Kate Putnam crossed the ball in front of the goal mouth, connecting Johnston for the score.

With 7:56 left on the clock before the intermission, Putnam again set up a Johnston goal — another close range shot that Pizzi could not handle.

Though she had two goals in her pocket at halftime, Johnston was still not finished. Just over seven minutes into the second half, she deflected a ball from Vicky Browne, after Browne fired a shot from 8–yards out.

"We opened up some spaces on the field," UMass coach Patty Shea said. "Erica seems to move better with more space, and it helps Vicky out as well. Lucy Koch, too."

Browne did not finish the afternoon with a lone assist. She added some offensive punch of her own in the form of two goals.

The junior transfer got the afternoon's scoring underway with a rifle of a shot from just inside the circle. Six minutes into the game, Browne powered a drive from the top left side of the circle that Pizzi could not cover.

She collected her second of the day just before halftime. After taking a pass from Koch, Browne beat her defender and assumed a one–on–one relationship with Pizzi. When the Ram goalie came out to challenge the midfielder, Browne unleashed a ball that cruised to the back of the Rhode Island cage.

"They came out fired up today," Shea said. "We had a good practice yesterday and they were ready to play today. And it showed."

The win is doubly important for the Minutewomen. Not only does it stop a three–game losing skid, but it means UMass opens conference play on solid footing.

"Every game's a big game," Shea said. "But conference games are always really big. And it's great to get a win to start the conference.

"We grew a lot from the Northeastern game (a 3–0 loss Saturday)," she continued. "As a coach, all that you can ask of your players is that they continue to grow with every game."

Part of UMass' growth has come with the on–field experience the Minutewomen freshmen have gained. Koch, Sally Russo, Patty Robinson, Kristen Schmidt and UMass goalie Zowie Tucker (who is a freshman by NCAA eligibility standards) have all contributed solid minutes and serious efforts.

"There is a lot of talent in that group of freshmen," Shea said. "They are steady and they are ready to compete."

The Minutewomen continue their conference slate Sunday when Temple visits UMass.

UMass men's soccer stumbles; yet gains ranking

By Jackie Leroux
Collegian Staff

There's good news and bad news from the Massachusetts men's soccer team this week. The good news is that after rolling off three straight wins, including an upset of No. 9 Boston University, and a win over No. 22 New Hampshire, the team has cracked the national rankings. UMass men's soccer is now the eleventh best team in the nation.

The bad news is that their new status could not help them overcome the Hartford Hawks on Tuesday night. Hartford, who was an NCAA semi–finalist last year, stole a win from the Minutemen in a game that was tightly contested.

Hartford	1

After the regulation 90 minutes of play, the score still stood at 0-0. It wasn't until the second sudden death overtime that Hartford's Dominic Willock scored on a rebound shot that ricochet off the cross bar to give Hartford the 1–0 win. The loss was UMass' first of the season, and its first overtime loss in its past 17 overtime games. The last one was a 1–0 loss to George Washington on October 13, 1991.

"They were a good team," said head coach Sam Koch. "They were fast and they were big."

Koch attributed the loss to missed chances by the Minutemen.

"We had our chances, we created a lot of chances, but we just couldn't put them away yesterday," Koch said. "We missed a lot of easy chances that we had been making up until then... We could have easily won the game 2–0 in regulation."

The Hawks tough defense also played a role in the loss, namely shutting down UMass' top scorer, Mike Butler. Hartford has some of the top fullbacks in New England, and they put out some solid play, and were able to contain the Minutemen's offense.

Another top factor was Hawk goalie Christian DiGenova, who had five saves.

"He made a couple of outstanding saves, Todd Fowler also had some great saves," Koch said.

Fowler, UMass' hot goalie of the moment, had five saves. Hartford outshot UMass 21–16, but UMass held an 8–7 edge in corner kicks. The game was one in which things could have gone either way, but Hartford got their break first.

"They were the better team, "Koch said. "but only on the day."

There is still concern about the number of overtime games the team has played in. This was their fifth overtime game in a row, in which they have won three, tied one, and, now, lost one. Fatlgue is very much a factor for their team, but the training and conditioning Koch puts them through has prepared them for it.

"We do a lot of our fitness in our training session, and we try to make sure that our training sessions are as intense as they can be," Koch said. "Our goal is to make our training tougher than our games."

On a happier note, senior forward Mike Butler was named to the "Soccer America" collegiate team of the week, thanks to his recent play. Butler has been outstanding as of late, with game–winning goals against B.U. and Maine, and an assist in the winner against New Hampshire.

Things are not going to get any easier for the men's soccer team this weekend. Their fitness and scoring will be put to the test when they begin their A–10 schedule, taking it to the road against St. Bonaventure on Friday, and Duquesne on Sunday.

Corrupt communists expelled in China

BEIJING (AP) — China's Communist Party said yesterday it has expelled 121,500 members in a five-year anti-corruption effort that saw hundreds of thousands of officials investigated for problems ranging from bribery to feasting at public expense.

Those caught included Chen Xitong, a former mayor and party boss of Beijing expelled from the party Sept. 9 and handed over to prosecutors for involvement in a multimillion-dollar corruption scandal.

In a report detailing its anti-corruption efforts, the party watchdog Central Commission for Discipline Inspection said there had been progress in several areas in the past five years. But statistics contained in the report, which was published by the official Xinhua News Agency, showed that corruption remains a major problem, reaching up to the high echelons of the 58 million-member party.

More than 669,300 officials were disciplined between October 1992 and June this year, including more than 121,500 who were expelled from the party, the commission said.

It said 37,492 of those who were expelled also received criminal punishment.

Michigan student dies in campus stabbing

ANN ARBOR, Mich. (AP) — A man who was stabbing his student girlfriend on the University of Michigan campus yesterday was shot by a school police officer, and both died in surgery, authorities said. The officer, responding to 911 calls, drove into a campus parking lot shortly after midnight and fired when the man refused to obey his order to stop his attack on the woman, campus public safety director Leo Heatley said.

The woman was identified as Tamara Williams, a 20-year-old senior. Her killer was identified as Kevin Nelson, 26, who lived with Williams but was not affiliated with the university.

Nelson was convicted of a domestic assault on Williams in 1995, university spokeswoman Julie Peterson said.

Williams' 2 1/2-year-old daughter was asleep in the apartment and was placed in protective custody, Heatley said. He did not give her name.

Williams and Nelson both died in surgery at the University of Michigan Medical Center.

Campus police got several calls of an attack in progress at 12:17 a.m., Heatley said.

Nelson started stabbing Williams in their apartment, Heatley said. "She was able to get to a neighbor's home and knock on the window," Heatley said.

Scott King, Schroeder headline Crossworlds 1997 talk at Mullins

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

Non–violent social change, feminism and youth activism were among the topics discussed last night at Crossworlds 1997, a discussion between Coretta Scott King, widow of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr., and Patricia Schroeder, former congresswoman of Colorado.

Introduced by Cora Bagley Marrett, University of Massachusetts provost and vice chancellor for Academic Affairs, and Massachusetts state representative Ellen Story, Scott King and Schroeder shared their similarities in personal histories and views with the audience in the Mullins Center.

Both women sensed in themselves early in life a need to affect others in a positive way.

"I always believed there was a role I was to play, and that was why I had to get out of the South. We have to discover our role in life," Scott King said.

Schroeder echoed this sentiment, and noted that both of their husbands had been supportive

UEO discusses campus, local labor issues at its first meeting

By Julie Siegal
Collegian Staff

The Undergraduate Employee Organization (UEO), a registered student organization that focuses on local, national and on-campus labor issues, held its first general meeting Wednesday night in the Cape Cod lounge to discuss future plans for the semester.

Although the UEO has some ideas, nothing is etched in stone until members develop a sense of what they want to accomplish this semester, said Nikki Morse, senior Social Thought and Political Economy Program (STPEC) major.

"A lot depends on if we're able to bring in new members," Morse said. "I'm not dictating what the group is going to do throughout the year. It depends on the group."

The UEO's current projects include circulating petitions in support of Hampshire College's staff unionization drive. The school's clerical workers, who want to form a union, are being held back and threatened with their jobs by the administration, Morse said.

"We want the [Hampshire College] administration to know there's support from the Five College system," Morse said.

A teach–in is being planned in November in combination with the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) to organize workshops and movies on workers' rights.

From 12–2 p.m. on Saturday, Oct. 4 at the Holyoke Mall, the UEO is participating in a day of action focusing on the effort to end sweatshop abuse.

The group is in the process of organizing an informal theatrical production at the mall in opposition of sweatshops, instead of just handing out flyers or written information.

"People at the mall are not interested with flyers," said Mike Gearin, senior STPEC and history major. "I think it's cool to do some form of entertainment."

The UEO is also dealing with issues concerning the picket code changes made this summer, as members of the group oppose those changes.

Lastly, the organization plans on bringing in more social events, like debates, panel discussions and movies, in addition to its political rhetoric.

The UEO encourages other ideas, such as matters concerning on–campus and administration policies, Gearin said.

"I'm interested in corporate influence at universities like ours — like how money is given to the University and how it's spent," Gearin said. "Math and sciences and the more marketable majors get top priority because more corporations have that in their best interest. The humanities and social sciences are getting left out."

Although the UEO just came together last fall, the students involved have no complaints thus far.

"I feel it's a great way to eventually gain a voice for the undergraduate student population," said Adam Feldman, a senior philosophy and economics major.

All students interested in the UEO are encouraged to attend the weekly meetings at 7 p.m., Wednesday in the Cape Cod Lounge.

Students discuss picketing, Goodell, at Faculty Senate

By Michael Elliott and Sumandra Ghosh
Collegian Staff

Students packed the Faculty Senate meeting yesterday afternoon in Herter Hall looking for the answers to questions that have lingered since the March takeover of the Goodell Administration Building.

Only one answer materialized as the meeting adjourned — students have few allies within the inner circles of the University of Massachusetts administration and faculty.

News Analysis

Approximately 65 students, sitting amongst faculty members and on the floor wherever space provided, were clearly using their numbers as a form of silent protest towards what they perceive to be another hostile, bureaucratic institution at the University.

Recent events seem to support this claim, which graduate and undergraduate students addressed at the meeting.

Controversy surrounded two University decisions made over the course of the summer. First is the reimposition of a picketing code that is questionably legal, and secondly, the elimination of a popular program within the School of Education which houses roughly half of the Native American graduate students on campus.

Students decried these moves as gestures of bad faith on the part of the University and demanded the attention of the Faculty Senate.

Students were made aware of the School of Education's plan to eliminate the curriculum and learning program on March 3, as the Goodell occupation got underway.

Student leaders claim that several top–level administrators assured students during the Goodell negotiations that the program would remain intact.

Both Deepika Mayra, president of the Graduate Student Senate and Rodina Cave, who was enrolled in the program, said that the administrators not only "promised" that planned restructuring within the School of Education would not negatively impact the curriculum and learning program, but insisted that programs of this nature were of great importance to the University because of its emphasis on indige-

Marv Albert pleads guilty; NBC fires him

By Michelle Boorstein
Associated Press

ARLINGTON, Va. — After three days that put the details of his kinky sex life on trial, Marv Albert pleaded guilty yesterday to assault and battery charges that could bring him a year behind bars and perhaps a lifetime of humiliation.

Within hours, NBC fired him.

"From my point of view. I just felt like I had to end this ordeal." Albert said outside court in a weary voice after agreeing to a deal in which prosecutors dropped the more serious charge of forcible sodomy, which carried from five years to life in prison. Albert, 56, was accused by a longtime lover of flinging her onto a bed, viciously biting her back and forcing her to perform oral sex in an Arlington hotel room Feb. 12 because she failed to bring another man into their bed.

His plea came a day after a surprise witness came forward with similar accusations: that Albert — wearing white panties and a garter belt — bit her on the neck and tried to force her to perform oral sex on him during a 1994 struggle in a Dallas hotel room that left her holding the sportscaster's toupee.

"The significance of that testimony is profound," said Arlington County Commonwealth's Attorney Richard Trodden, adding that the plea bargain was endorsed by Albert's 42-year-old accuser. As he left court, Albert thanked NBC for standing by him. But less than four hours later, the network issued a statement saying it only stood by Albert because he gave assurances the charges were untrue. "Today, given Mr. Albert's plea... NBC terminates its relationship with Marv Albert."

Albert, who for three decades has been one of America's most distinctive play-by-play voices — with his exuberant "Yesss!" call — later issued a statement of his own, resigning from the regional MSG cable network as the voice of basketball's New York Knicks.

"I fully understand the position in which the networks found themselves due to my very painful situation," Albert said. "In the interest of my family, my friends and my many supporters, I step aside with deep humility and will seek to reconstruct my personal and professional life."

Albert's lawyer, Roy Black, said his client accepted the deal because the judge had gutted his case.

"If all our evidence had been allowed, we wouldn't be in this position," said Black, who successfully defended William Kennedy Smith against a rape charge in 1991. "I thought it was the best way for Marv to end this matter."

Under Virginia's rape shield law, the judge is allowed to bar evidence of a sex assault victim's past. The defense intended to introduce evidence that Albert's accuser had a pat-

Chancellor Scott tackles grave facility conditions

By Tamar Carroll

Chancellor David K. Scott highlighted the grave condition of the University of Massachusetts' facilities at yesterday's Faculty Senate meeting.

During his update on the Strategic Action Plan, Scott stressed the pressing necessity of reparative maintenance on the University's facilities, which are in a state of deterioration.

"There is a huge ticking time bomb sitting out there," Scott said. "We have to get the attention of the state; this has to be our focus."

According to figures produced by the administration, the University would have to spend $40,000,000 a year for the next 20 years just to maintain the current condition of the campus buildings, which are already in disrepair.

"Clearly we can not afford to carve that out of our operating budget," Scott said. "This has to get onto the radar screen of the president and the Board of Trustees."

On a more positive note, Scott also tracked the progress of the University in other areas during the past 16 years, noting the financial and institutional distress experienced by the University during the years of 1988 to 1994, and said

V.P. Gore inks deal with Russia; weapons plants to be converted

By Lynn Berry
Associated Press

MOSCOW — Vice President Al Gore clinched a long-sought deal yesterday with Russian officials to convert three of Russia's nuclear weapons plants to civilian uses, part of U.S. efforts to ensure that Moscow safeguards and reduces its vast nuclear stockpile.

"It's so historic. It's so important for world peace," said U.S. Energy Secretary Federico Pena, who took part in the discussions.

Gore also had a lengthy meeting with Russian President Boris Yeltsin to try to smooth tensions over Iran. Russia is helping Iran build a nuclear power plant, and the United States fears the technology could be used to develop a nuclear bomb.

"There's no doubt in my mind that the goals of Russia and the United States are the same," Gore said after the meeting. "We share the same concern over weapons of mass destruction."

Gore spent two days working with Russian Premier Viktor Chernomyrdin on a range of issues; preventing the spread of nuclear weapons technology topped the list.

Announcing a deal that has been in the works for several years, the two sides said three Russian plants that produced weapons grade plutonium will be converted to production of uranium for civilian power plants.

The conversions, to begin in 2000, are expected to cost $150 million, of which the United States expects to pay about $80 million and Russia about $70 million. Discussions in the past also have dealt with jointly monitoring the civilian-grade uranium and creating an international market for the product.

With Russia's economy ailing, Moscow is eager to export the few items it can market internationally, including weapons and nuclear technology. But Moscow insists it is not providing any technology or parts that would help Iran or other nations acquire long-range missiles or nuclear weapons.

It was Gore's first meeting with Yeltsin since the Russian president underwent heart surgery last fall.

that since then, the University has experienced recovery in many significant areas.

"During the period I call instability, everything went the wrong way for those six years," Scott said. "Applications dropped, student costs rose, the research budget fell. Since fiscal year 1994, the period since I arrived, everything is again going in the right direction."

Scott noted that total applications to the University increased from 16,052 in 1994 to 18,009 this year, while the average Scholastic Aptitude Test (SAT) scores of incoming freshmen rose from 1090 on the re-centered scale in 1994 to 1125 this fall. Twenty-one percent of this year's freshmen class consists of students of color, and student costs have been lowered.

Scott also outlined the fiscal year 1998 budget, indicating where the $13.2 million increase from the state legislature would be spent.

The majority of the funds, approximately $4.5 million, will go to unanticipated costs, including $1.6 million to need-based financial aid, $1.2 million to replacement of lost tuition waivers for student athletes and musicians, who, per order of the state Board of Higher Education, can no longer receive tuition waivers, and $800,000 for restoration of the Old Chapel.

Forty-three million dollars will go to salary increases, and another $4 million to major initiatives outlined in the Strategic Action Plan, including strengthening the library, improving campus information technology, renovating classrooms, and student advising and retention.

Scott said that the funds from the state legislature will definitely not be used to rehire faculty and staff lost in the early retirement plan.

"No way," Scott said. "We are not going to rehire at this point."

After Scott finished his address, Rodina Cave, a graduate student in the School of Education, spoke to the Senate about the recent elimination of the Curriculum and Learning Program in the School of Education.

Cave said the program, which included a concentration in indigenous education, held 50 percent of all Native American graduate students enrolled at the University, and was unfairly eliminated.

"I request that the Faculty Senate investigate the School of Education in respect to this," said Cave to the loud applause of the 65 students who accompanied her to the meeting.

Lia Wong, president of the Student Government Association, also addressed the Senate, demanding more student input on several issues.

"First of all, I am really disappointed in the School of Education," Wong said. "I want these questions answered in six weeks. What happened to the honors college? Where was student input? When will students be allotted a time to serve on committees? Where was student input on these budget allocations?"

tern of threatening past boyfriends and that she was mentally unstable.

In their biggest coup, they played a tape for jurors Tuesday in which she appeared to coach and bribe a potential witness, a cab driver, into backing her claim that Albert was trying to procure another man for three-way sex.

Outside court, cabbie Walter "Biggie" Brodie confirmed that the woman wanted him to go prosecutors with a fabricated story and she would give him a share of her award from a planned $3 million lawsuit against Albert.

"She said, 'You broke and I'm broke and you got to do something for me,'" Brodie said. "'You got to call this [prosecutor] and tell her that one of the times you took Marv Albert back to the Washington Hilton he asked you to get a boy.' I said 'OK.'"

As Albert made his plea before Circuit Judge Benjamin N.A. Kendrick, his family and other supporters sat stoically in three rows of the courtroom, showing no visible reaction. His fiancee, ESPN producer Heather Faulkiner, sat with her hands clasped in her lap.

Sentencing was set for Oct. 24; he could receive up to a year in jail and a $2,500 fine for the single misdemeanor count. The judge ordered a presentencing investigation. Albert has no prior convictions.

"Judge Kendrick is a tough sentencing judge in cases of this type," said Henry Hudson, a former Arlington County prosecutor and former U.S. attorney in Alexandria. "On the other hand, this is a first offender with a good record, except for some of the testimony that came out at trial."

The plea came after a morning of closed-door meetings between Albert's lawyers and prosecutors. Troddeq said the deal Albert accepted was the same one he had offered him before the trial. Juror Kerri Nelson told Fox News Channel that she "did not feel there was enough evidence to convict Albert."

of this need to make a difference.

"We weren't waiting for a prince to come pick us up, we knew we had to get out there and make a contribution. When we did meet our husbands, they saw us as full partners," Schroeder said.

As a black woman growing up in the South, Scott King said she felt as if she already had two strikes against her, but credited her parents with instilling a sense of equality and value in her as a child.

"I was involved in causes to bring about liberation. I knew I would always have a lifetime struggle... we had to work to break down those barriers. I realized that it was part of my calling and it was like a moment of truth when it hit me," Scott King said.

Scott King also discussed the difficulties in raising her children when her husband was spending so much time in jail in the 1960s.

"I had to make them understand that going to jail was a badge of honor, not a disgrace," Scott King said.

Schroeder was quick to show her admiration of Scott King and her actions during that time in history.

"I think I'm pretty tough, but I don't know what I'd do if my husband was in jail for a cause I cared about," Schroeder said.

The conversation then turned to "Generation X" and the contributions young people today are making to humanity.

"Rather than wringing our hands and saying 'oh it's not perfect yet', what we need to be saying is 'there's so much change yet to make'," Schroeder said.

Both women urged audience members to vote in all elections and run for public office.

"We have to find a way to motivate young people to be a solution to the problem, not the problem itself," Scott King said.

"It takes one individual with courage to stand up for what you believe in. We need to help our young people understand the methods of non-violent change," Scott King said.

Schroeder said that she would like to see more people of conscience in public office instead of those who can raise the most money. She then asked Scott King if she would ever consider running for president of the United States.

"I have no desire to hold an elected office... too many politicians get caught up and bought off. The good people, unfortunately don't always get elected," Scott King said.

"I hope there are people out here who will someday be elected leaders," Schroeder said, gesturing to the audience.

While discussing the civil rights struggle of the 1960s, Scott King and Schroeder spoke of its effects on white women as well as black.

"More women need to be in the forefront of policy making... we'd eventually have a more humane society," Schroeder said. "Women don't want to walk in front of men or behind men, but along side men."

Scott King and Schroeder asked each other if there was anything they would have done differently with their lives if they could live them over. Both women agreed that every struggle, every challenge, every heartbreak was worth it.

"It's been very challenging and painful at times, lonely even. But I've had a sense of fulfillment I couldn't have had otherwise. It's a great feeling to know you're fulfilling your purpose," Scott King said.

"I think we're both very rich women. Not in the bank sense, but in other ways, and I wouldn't change that for the world," Schroeder said.

nous education.

"We were told it would not be cut," said Cave, a Native American, as she addressed the body, flanked by other displaced students from her program. "We were told it was valued for the diversity it brings to campus."

She implicated Bailey Jackson, dean of the School of Education in what she characterized as a "personal vendetta... to get ride of the program."

Jackson, who attended the meeting, was unavailable for comment.

While it becomes increasingly clear to students that the University may renege on many promises made during and after the Goodell takeover, the re-appearance of the Picketing Code suggests that University officials are positioning themselves to prevent further student uprisings.

Several undergraduate students voiced a strong dissatisfaction with the Universities mass-mailing of the picketing code over the summer, calling it a intimidation tactic.

Salwa Shamapande, vice-president of the Black Student Union and Student Government Association (SGA) secretary of University policy said the picketing code "is an attempt to stifle future protest."

He emphasized that the decision was dictated down to Chancellor David K. Scott by UMass President William M. Bulger, who has long voiced a strong resistance towards student activists.

The code stipulates that University officials can not negotiate with students "who occupy any University facility, or with associated demonstrators, while any such occupation continues." In other words, the code leaves the University with only one option when dealing with student sit-ins and building occupations; mass arrests.

Students expressed to the faculty senate that they reacted to the picketing code, which has existed for years but never been enforced, as a threat against further action.

The only people who seemed intimated at the Faculty Senate meeting, however, was the faculty themselves. Nearly all faculty members sat in silence as they listened to often emotional pleas from students, refusing to join their supporters in the crowd with applause.

SGA President Lia Wong, for example, demanded proof from the University that funds have been made available for students who cannot pay their bills in full by the Bursars Office withdrawal deadline. This was a key issue for students during the Goodell negotiations but has received little attention within the Faculty Senate.

When Shamapande, the last student speaker, finished his brief statement, faculty members immediately turned the discussion to another issue.

The faculty members and administrators who had not already left during the student speeches exited quickly as the meeting adjourned.

Many questions have been left unresolved. Is the University upholding the agreements made after the Goodell takeover or are they seeking to undermine the progress made by students activists?

If the latter proves correct, as many students at the meeting feared, who or what body should students target — the Chancellor, the President, the Board of Higher Education, the Board of Trustees or the Faculty Senate itself?

After yesterday, it is evident that students are casting aside presumptions of UMass' so-called liberal faculty and turning a skeptical eye on the Faculty Senate.

President commemorates brave "Little Rock nine"

By Terence Hunt
Associated Press

LITTLE ROCK, Ark.— In a powerful gesture of racial healing, President Clinton pulled open the front door of Central High School yesterday and stood back to welcome nine blacks who had braved hate-filled mobs 40 years ago to break an all-white color barrier.

"What happened here changed the course of our country forever," Clinton said, recalling a racial drama that wrenched America and was seared in history on television screens around the world.

"Forty years ago today, they climbed these steps, passed through this door and moved our nation. And for that we must all thank them," said Clinton. The audience — blacks and white together — roared approval.

But even as he commemorated an important, early victory of the civil rights movement, Clinton warned that American schools are resegregating, opportunities for jobs and education remain unequal and affirmative action programs are being rolled back, "slamming shut the doors of higher education on a new generation."

"Segregation is no longer the law," Clinton said, "but too often separation is still the rule. And we cannot forget one stubborn fact that has not yet been said as clearly as it should: There is still discrimination in America.

"We have to keep working on it — not just with our voices but with our laws," the president said. "And we have to engage each other in it."

Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, a Republican, also stirred the crowd, saying, "What happened here 40 years ago was simply wrong. It was evil. And we renounce it."

Huckabee, a Baptist minister, said that in many parts of the South, "It was the white churches that helped not only ignore the problems of racism but in many cases actually fostered those feelings and those sentiments." He called on all religious leaders "to say never, never, never, never again will we be silent."

Clinton was 11 years old during the Little Rock crisis, attending segregated schools 50 miles away in Hot Springs. "It was Little Rock that made racial equality a driving obsession in my life," he said.

After a morning drizzle, skies turned blue and a warm sun beat down on Central students and hundreds of guests, including the family of the late Supreme Court Justice Thurgood Marshall, a civil rights pioneer.

Now middle-aged, the so-called Little Rock Nine — six women and three men — basked in cheers and applause, a sharp contrast to the taunts and jeers they braved as teenagers. The president led them up Central's steps and he held open the school's heavy glass-paneled doors, greeting each of the nine with a handshake or a pat. Clinton was assisted by Huckabee and Little Rock Mayor Jim Dailey.

The dramatic gesture had been suggested by students and by the nine who had been turned back, presidential spokesman Mike McCurry said.

One of the nine, Minnijean Brown Trickey, a social worker in Ontario, became overwhelmed and reached out emotionally to Clinton and Huckabee for comfort. "It was pretty strong symbolism," she said of the president's gesture.

Another member of the nine, Terrence Roberts, said, "The whole affair was a hopeful sign for this country's future."

Forty years ago, President Eisenhower ordered the Army's 101st Airborne Division to Little Rock to escort blacks into classes after then-Gov. Orval Faubus mobilized the Arkansas National Guard to block integration. It was the first real test of the government's willingness to use force to implement the 1954 Supreme Court's Brown vs. Board of Education decision outlawing school segregation.

Senate campaign reform committee clashes

By Larry Margasak
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — After weeks of testimony about campaign fund-raising abuses, a Senate investigating panel clashed yesterday over who is responsible and how to fix the problems, foreshadowing a Senate debate on the subject next month.

The current system, asserted Sen. John Glenn, (D-Ohio), has led to a "government of the rich, by the rich and for the rich." But Sen. Robert Bennett, (R-Utah), said proposed solutions may be worse than the old system they are designed to replace, and unconstitutional as well. "The history books say that the 'bad old system'... may have been more refreshing and more open and more American," he said.

Among issues debated by the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee were the use of soaring, unlimited party-building donations.

Eliminating the so-called "soft money" loophole would "remove the primary incentive behind most of the offensive behavior" documented by the panel's summer-long hearings, said Thomas Mann, a congressional scholar at the non-profit Brookings Institution.

Government figures released Monday shined new light on the problem, showing that Republicans and Democrats raised more unregulated donations — known as "soft money" — in the first half of 1997 than they did during the kickoff of the last presidential election cycle.

The sudden change of direction in the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee hearings will give its chairman, Sen. Fred Thompson, (R-Tenn.), a potential presidential candidate, and members of his committee a larger role if a campaign finance reform bill reaches the Senate floor this year.

To get expert testimony on the fund-raising system, the committee will give up for now — perhaps for good — stories of large donors buying access to the White House and foreign money finding its way into party coffers.

On a separate track, the Justice Department is conducting a 30-day review of the fund-raising activities of President Clinton and Vice President Al Gore — the first step in determining whether to seek an independent counsel.

Gore has acknowledged making fund-raising calls from the White House, and Clinton said he may have done so but can't remember. A 114-year-old federal law prohibits political solicitations on U.S. property, but aspects of the statute are vague and it is not clear whether it applies to the president and vice president.

A White House memo dated Oct. 18, 1994, suggests Clinton made a fund-raising call to a wealthy California businessman who then contributed $50,000. The New York Times reported yesterday. The newspaper said San Diego investment banker John Torkelson sent two checks, each for $25,000, to the Democratic National Committee within two weeks of what the memo referred to as a Clinton phone call from the White House.

Clinton told reporters Monday in New York City, "I am absolutely positive that we intended to be firmly within the letter of the law when we were out there campaigning and raising funds, as we should have been doing. We had to do that."

Meanwhile, former presidential aide Harold Ickes told Senate investigators he did not know whether Clinton actually made fund-raising calls from the White House, according to Senate officials familiar with a closed-door deposition.

Ickes, who was the main White House political staffer during the last campaign, was recalled by investigators. He has not been called to testify in public.

The ex-aide told Governmental Affairs Committee attorneys he did not coordinate with special interest groups on advertising campaigns and other expenditures. When these organizations make so-called independent expenditures, they are not permitted to coordinate with candidates or parties meant to benefit from the effort.

Algerian terrorist attack leaves 200 dead

By Rachid Khiari
Associated Press Writer

ALGIERS, Algeria — Attackers shot or stabbed to death at least 200 people early yesterday and wounded 100 more, hospital sources said, making the raid one of the deadliest since Algeria's Islamic insurgency began in 1992. Survivors said the assailants took their time plundering homes before retreating.

The attack took place in the Bentalha neighborhood of Baraki, an eastern suburb of the Algerian capital, the sources said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

The official government news agency said 85 people died and 67 were wounded — far fewer than figures provided by hospitals receiving casualties. It condemned the massacre as an "act of barbary" carried out by "terrorists."

"We kept watch every night since August, but the attack surprised us," said one mother who was searching for her child at the Zemirli d'El Harrach hospital. She spoke on condition of anonymity.

A bomb attack this morning in Reghaia, a town 19 miles east of Algiers, also killed two people and wounded 25, the hospital sources said.

Nobody claimed responsibility for either of today's attacks. The Bentalha neighborhood is considered a stronghold for Islamic militants close to the Armed Islamic Group, a group often blamed for massacres and one of the most violent Muslim organizations trying to overthrow Algeria's military-backed government.

The banned Islamic Salvation Front condemned the attack. Massacres have been increasingly frequent in Algeria, despite stepped-up government attempts to curb them in the run-up to Oct. 23 local and regional elections.

On Aug. 29, about 300 people were slaughtered in Rais, a village 15 miles south of the capital, in what appears to have been the worst carnage since the Islamic insurgency began. Survivors and hospital sources said 200 people were wounded in that attack. According to survivors of today's pre-dawn raid, two groups of about 40 attackers took their time killing people and robbing their homes before fleeing.

After the massacre, panicked residents began fleeing toward downtown Algiers, about 12 miles away. Soldiers surrounded the area, allowing only ambulances and official vehicles to go in. A bomb explosion in July in Baraki killed about 20 people and injured 40 more.

Armed villagers backed by the army said they fought off an early morning assault by a group of suspected Islamic militants in a village south of the capital.

The villagers repulsed about 200 armed attackers near Tipasa, 60 miles west of Algiers, the residents said today on condition of anonymity. The attackers, they said, set off a bomb late Monday in a village park and stole three trucks full of food, including flour from a baker they had just robbed.

Milosevic, Radicals to share power

By Mishia Savic
Associated Press

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia — The party of Yugoslavia's most powerful politician will be forced to share power for the first time in 10 years, according to Serbian election results announced yesterday.

Serbia's new government will likely be a coalition between Yugoslav President Slododan Milosevic's Socialists, who have ruled in the decade since Milosevic took control, and the ultranational-ist Radical Party.

With 236 of 250 parliamentary seats counted following Sunday's vote, Milosevic's Socialist bloc had 98 seats and the ultranationalist Radical Party had 80.

The opposition Serbian Renewal Movement had 45 seats and the remaining 13 were distributed among five smaller parties, according to the Serbian electoral committee.

That gives the Socialists a choice between forming a coalition with the nationalistic Radicals or the Renewal Movement, whose moderate, democratically minded leader is a Milosevic critic. Radical leader Vojislav Seselj preaches a "Serbia for Serbs" ideology that eclipses even the extreme views of the Socialists during the bloody breakup of the former, larger Yugoslavia.

Although Milosevic has since moved away from nationalism to placate the outside world and stay in power, both his party and the Radicals have worked together in the past when both thought it politically convenient.

But at a news conference yesterday, Seselj said he had not yet decided whether his party would join with the Socialists and that any combination of the three main parties was possible — including a coalition of them all.

"We are open for negotiations," Seselj said.

He repeated his plan for expanding Serbia to the west to include "traditionally Serb-populated areas" in Bosnia-Herzegovina and Croatia, adding that his party's extreme views mean the Socialists might opt to join with the more moderate Renewal Movement. The Renewal Movement leader, third-place presidential candidate Vuk Draskovic, did not say whether his party would enter a coalition with the Socialists.

But Draskovic is almost certain to rule out a union with Seselj. While once preaching pro-Serb nationalism, he has since refashioned himself as a moderate who advocates democracy.

The final district still to be counted represents about 14 seats in Serbia's parliament, all of them certain to come from the Socialists or the Radicals.

The district is in Kosovo, the southern region where ethnic Albanians, who make up 90 percent of the population, boycotted the vote because they want independence. As a result, the vote will be decided by the small number of Serbs living there.

In the presidential race, Milosevic' protege, Zoran Lilic, faces a runoff against Seselj. Lilic failed to win the necessary 51 percent of the vote for a first-round victory, but he is likely to win in the second round, scheduled for Oct. 5.

The Socialists have wider support than the Radicals, and opposition parties may throw their support behind Lilic, seeing him as the lesser of two evils.

Lilic is the former Yugoslav president — a post now held by Milosevic. Because the Serbian constitution barred Milosevic from a third term as Serbia's president, he engineered his appointment as Yugoslav president through the Socialist-dominated parliament. Seselj, a federal lawmaker and mayor of a town on the outskirts of Belgrade, appeals to people disgruntled with Milosevic for dragging Yugoslavia into war and then signing the 1995 U.S.-brokered peace accord.

Draskovic has said his party plans to boycott the presidential runoff — another factor that should guarantee victory for Lilic. Voter turnout was 62 percent in Sunday's vote, despite a boycott by a large section of the pro-democracy opposition. The opposition had hoped at least 51 percent of the electorate would boycott the vote to render it invalid.

Senate Finance Committee Chairman Roth blasts IRS, says bureau pushing guidelines

By Bob Wells
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Opening a three-day review of the IRS, a Senate committee chairman said yesterday tax collectors use false identification and pursue taxpayers "who can't afford to fight back" to meet collection quotas.

The IRS said the attacks are misleading or unfounded.

"We are holding these hearings because one thing is certain. We can't fix the IRS without knowing what ails the IRS," said Senate Finance Committee Chairman William V. Roth Jr., (R-Del).

Amid criticism the hearings were being propelled by the GOP's anti-tax agenda, Roth said he seeks "constructive criticism — criticism with the intent to improve not destroy. This is not IRS bashing; it is oversight."

Senators, authors and tax-related trade groups were among the first witnesses called to describe the agency's troubles.

But the hearings are generating quite a buzz over expected whistleblower testimony from current and former agents later in the week, some of whom will have their identities concealed. They are expected to say the agency unfairly singles out small taxpayers least likely to defend themselves for collections, an accusation the IRS says is against its procedures.

Advance media reports about such allegations prompted taxpayers on Monday to jam the telephone switchboard of Roth's office. Roth outlined findings in his committee's six-month investigation:

• Many revenue officers were issued false identification, Roth said, purportedly to protect officers from assault. "I'm concerned that it makes them unaccountable," he said. Roth said using false IDs is forbidden by IRS rules, except in criminal investigations.

• Tax assessments "that have no basis on fact or tax law" were levied to "simply raise the individual statistics of an IRS employee."

• The "commonplace" use of tax collection quotas to rate the success of agents or officers. "And this, I believe, is outrageous, a major problem that has become part of the agency's culture," Roth said. The IRS denied this practice exists and noted it was prohibited in a 1988 law.

• A preference to audit middle- and lower-income taxpayers. IRS spokesman Frank Keith denied the quota allegation, saying there has been "a longstanding policy made into law in the 1980s that prohibits use of enforcement statistics to promote or reward employees or their supervisors."

Keith said tax collectors can use registered pseudonyms if they can show they face threats. "Assaults on IRS employees, sad to say, are a reality," he said. Citing audits of the IRS, he also denied the agency disproportionately targets lower-income taxpayers.

Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin sought Monday to minimize fallout from the hearings by apologizing in advance for any misconduct uncovered by Roth's panel.

"I deeply regret any mistreatment of taxpayers," Rubin said in a letter to Roth. Rubin has asked the IRS to describe discipline and corrective actions it took in response to abuses.

Rubin strongly emphasized the hearings should place any abuses in context of the agency's enormous task, collecting $1.5 trillion annually from 209 million tax returns. About 83 percent of taxpayers pay their taxes voluntarily.

"We are working hard to reform the IRS, and it would be counterproductive at best, and very harmful at worst, if these hearings undermined morale and damaged our efforts," Rubin wrote. He also warned that "we have seen widespread threats and incidents of violence against these public servants and bomb threats against IRS facilities." In the last five years, there were 3,200 reported threats and assaults on IRS workers, he said. Collecting taxes never has been a popular job, and it's become less so due to widely documented problems at the IRS that include a failed computer modernization that's hampered the agency's ability to efficiently track and resolve taxpayer cases.

One of today's scheduled witnesses was Sen. Bob Kerrey, (D-Neb.), who acknowledges Congress has a role in the IRS' lack of direction. "We found that we in Congress often send conflicting signals to the agency," Kerrey told the House Ways and Means Committee last week. Kerrey referred to findings by the National Commission on Restructuring the IRS, which he and Rep. Rob Portman, (R-Ohio), headed earlier this year.

Letters to the Editor

Who is the victim?

To the Editor:

The victimization of the black spirit is still running rampant in our society. It only takes the coat of sun baked skin to decipher this reality. The carving up of the world is the tool that is use to further confine us to poverty stricken shanty camps. The barbarians that feed upon the black spirit have not have their fill and so we Africans are left to walk around with half eaten souls.

Many takers might say, "What about the white Africans and isn't capitalism the great equalizer?"

First of all, capitalism is the source of Africana demise since the onset of the triangular trade. The triangular trade promotes death among the involuntary tenants of the middle passage. In an equally vile gesture, African spirit and vibe continues to suffer through the unsafe territory of one–sided and back–sided laws and regulations. Nevertheless, there is a continuance to the middle passage today.

Lobengula signed a contract that was to protect him from all the indunas who seek to invade his land, but in actuality he gave his land up without a fight. Well that's not the way it went, he was tricked... John Moffat was the son of Robert Moffat who was the friend of Mzilikazi (the great bull elephant). Lobengula (the great Lion) was the son of Mzilikazi and so the title of brother was given John Moffat by Lobengula. To make a long story short, this association of Lobengula and Robert Moffat ended with said contract.

However there are many instances in the archives of history that such associations have lead to the downfall of Africana.

Let me just clear up one thing before I continue... The word Africana is used very loosely not out of lack of respect but rather for my purposes serves as a principal.

Nevertheless, ask yourself "What is a contract?" and keep the meaning in your conscious memory. Maybe if one replaces "Contract" with "Ordinance" they may understand the argument. At the beginning of every year we all, maybe not everyone, make an ordinance with ourselves or with other people. As usual, being human sometimes one fails to hold up said contract of ordinance. Now think for a second that you were the one who broke that contract. Now think about said contract being one who was made with another person. However the contract that was made by me (Omar), was one that entailed three entities, myself, (People's Market?), and the customers of said market.

Furthermore, think about the contract in question as a contract that was made by you with another person and that contract [is] broken everyday blatantly. As for accountability the person has none, and you are left wondering. To really make one understand the depth of this situation we will have to take a walk a little ways back.

Beside the fact that the market was financially inept and the semester has just started, someone in the market found it safe to betray one such contract. This said contract was made not only with the market but as far as know was also made with God. "Thou shalt not steal." To say the least the contract was broken. To my understanding this was being investigated. Fall semester '96 rolled around, and said contract was broken twice to the sum of about $1000.

Yes, that's what I said too. Now there is a total sum of $1500 stolen. That's not the bad part, the bad part is that there was an investigation into this matter, and guess what, there has not been a report about this matter presented to us (employees of Peoples' Market). Everybody that was involved in, or that was a potential witness was questioned. Being one of the last to come out the oven and one of the first to figure out that black skin and wool hair equals chief suspect, I knew my turn would eventually come... I got the phone call. Due to the mercy of God my M.I.A. behind was nowhere to be found when the contract was being broken. To say the least (People's Market?) seemed to have forgiven and forgot. There as not being a report to my knowledge (and I've checked) about this incident. You do the math.

I can go back recanting incidents upon incidents that these people have betrayed each other and myself, but that will only prove to be vindictive. Now though, let's take a look at the contract that was made by us to the customers of said market in like manner said contract was and is broken time and time again. The argument between myself and the other person involved, started two weeks previous. One evening I was in the market and I saw that person pick up the mop bucket, of all the things in the world, and dumped it into the sink. This same sink is used to wash the utensils, and at the time there were utensils in said sink; think of it as your kitchen sink. How many people dumped their mop bucket in their kitchen? I observed this and commented to this person that it was not sanitary and that it should not be done. This person interned snapped at me and so I bit my lip, so to speak, and walked away. I was going to bring up this incident at our all–staff meeting but I let it slide.

The day of the incident said person involved came in ten minutes late. The frustration of being in the market all morning long and seeing people doing things such as leaving the cheese that they were cutting open to flies and to add insult to injury, getting off register and without washing their hands return to cutting the cheese. Finding the cheese room most unsanitary, and then speaking to these people about said unsanitary situation and them not seeming to care; at this point was ridding short on my nerves. Imagine seeing these same people in the all–staff meeting getting emotional about recommitting to the market and yet they go and pull some of the most outrageous s—t. I sat back sometimes in disbelief that these are the same people who can't even commit to keeping the market sanitary.

Moreover I said that I will do my part to hold my end of the bargain, and I did. The person that was involved in said incident at the time had three hours of lateness and didn't seem to give a damn. The point I'm trying to make here is that if the culprit was myself, it would have been a whole other story, but it wasn't and so it was O.K.

Furthermore, for two years I've been telling and giving advice on how business should be run and they didn't listen. Not surprisingly at the beginning of the semester I heard that (People's Market?) had lost over $23,000. Stop and think for a second; these people would rather lose $23,000 before they take my advice. The lack of principle and sincerity that this business (People's Market?) is running on is almost sickening.

Nevertheless lets re–examine the incident for which I was taken out of my class, and taken to the police station where I spent the next couple of hours. If anybody reading this knows what the basement of the Amherst police station is like they wouldn't wish it on anyone. However I (Omar) am a business man and it does not make sense to make $6.25 per hour and then pay 90 cents per hour to park... I can't do that, it would narrow down my total earnings to $5 and 35 cents and plus it goes against my religion (miserism). So as usual I took my parking from the change cup. This person, after coming in late and being told by me to clean up after himself, found it appropriate to start an argument with me. Remember that I've been there for about four semesters and have sat in the all–staff meetings knowing all the thieves, all the liars and all the bigots... and have watch them lied to each other and I have not said a thing up to this point...

Why you ask? Because I did not care. But oh no, I could not leave good enough alone, this semester I had to go and give a damn and get all worked up over their nastiness. To make a long story short, this person accused me of stealing from the group. Yes, this made me mad and so I pushed him and recanted, "What?!" I proceeded to recount to this individual that I've been here cleaning up after them all morning and for him to leave me the hell alone. As for the knife situation, I am right handed and for all intents and purposes said hand was occupied with the change I had just taken. In the report that was sent to me It stated... "You (meaning myself) then grabbed a knife in your hand, grabbed (said person) by the neck and backed him into a corner in a very threatening manner."

When I read said report I said to myself, "Who the hell is this Omar character, he needs Jesus".

If this were true why didn't they call the police? Said person went on working and then went to class. Basically the individuals who took it upon themselves to call the police, an hour after said incident, for the most part didn't witness any such behavior by myself.

Consequently this goes to show that prejudices about Africans run so deep, even among those who claim to be free of any such evils; that it creates in their subconscious a nefarious fantasy. The point is there are no witnesses, but everyone knew what happened. This is a perfect example of white people walking around thinking that they are free of prejudices because they have Bob, Mumia and Peltier on their walls.

As for my name being all over the front page of the Collegian, I will say, be very careful when writing such statements when the person has not yet been convicted of any such crimes... They might sue you and then use the money (some of it anyway) and send you to law school.

"The victim's name has not been released."

Parking games

Amherst appears to be a peaceful New England town. Don't let appearances fool you. A political struggle of considerable local importance is currently being waged in meeting rooms and living rooms throughout the town. The issue: does Amherst need a parking garage, and, if so, what kind of a parking garage?

This debate comes to a head on Oct. 27, when town meeting representatives will vote on two competing garage proposals as well as on other parking-related issues. Citizens groups, business groups, and town boards and officials have lined up behind the competing garage proposals. Others have organized to resist building any garage in downtown Amherst. Leading town officials, including the Select Board and the Town Manager, are pushing for the larger of the two garage proposals. Reports produced by the town Planning Office seem to support these calls for building a large parking garage in Amherst's Boltwood Walk area.

Leo Maley

The Coalition for a Comprehensive Downtown Parking Action Plan, of which I am a member, recently undertook an analysis of parking data that is routinely and casually thrown around by town officials in their effort to garner public support for building a large parking garage.

The most important recent town parking report, an impressive-looking 13-page study mailed by the Select Board to all 240 town meeting members in mid-July, concludes that over the last 20 years a growing parking deficit has emerged in Amherst's 10 downtown blocks. The report further states that the problem is most acute in the six southern downtown blocks — the blocks roughly between the Carriage Shops and the Town Common. These blocks, we are told, have 1,058 parking spaces and an adjusted parking deficit of 547 spaces. These findings "indicate that there is a large problem," and that "without a garage, the downtown's... parking problems cannot begin to be addressed."

The problem, however, is that the town's numbers just don't add up. Coalition members have carefully counted — and documented — actual existing parking in these six central downtown blocks. We discovered that there are 382 more parking spaces in this area than are reported by the town — 1,440 spaces instead of 1,058. In an effort to understand why our parking space counts differed so dramatically from the towns', we requested parcel-by-parcel counts from the town Planning Department. They informed us that they were unable to retrieve these counts. How the town managed to understate parking supply for the six crucial southern downtown blocks remains a mystery.

The report's claims concerning parking demand are no less problematic than its claims concerning parking supply. Parking planners estimate parking demand for a given property by determining the useable floor area or seating capacity devoted to a particular activity and multiplying that area or capacity by a professionally accepted parking demand factor to derive the number of parking spaces theoretically needed for that use.

The National Parking Association, the Institute for Transportation Engineers, and similar authorities all urge use of parking demand factors that reflect the fact that people who drive to downtowns frequently use one parking space for multiple errands. Contrary to this professional consensus, the town used zoning bylaw parking standards for their 1997 parking demand study that: 1) produce larger peak parking demand results than standards recommended by professional parking organizations, 2) were not designed for and do not apply to Amherst Center, and 3) differ from those used in past town studies.

Our analysis of the town's estimated parking demand indicates that almost all of the town's claimed increase in parking demand results from the use of parking demand factors different from the town's 1977 Board to all 240 town meeting members in mid-July, concludes that over the last 20 years a growing parking deficit has emerged in Amherst's 10 downtown blocks. Ombudsperson not fulfilling role

On April 25, 1997, there was a gathering in Northampton of students and citizens of the area. This was a civil rights hearing by the Massachusetts State Advisory Committee for the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights. One of the items to be discussed was related to the Goodell Building Takeover in March 1997 on the UMass campus. Two students and UMass Ombudsperson Bob Ackermann spoke on this topic.

Although he had the right to be present, by speaking there Ackermann violated a number of principles and practices of the UMass Ombuds Office and the Ombuds profession, as well as violating the trust of many students.

As the Ombudsperson, it is fundamental to his role to assist in the resolution of disputes and grievances at the University in a way that maintains confidentiality, neutrality and that makes every effort to maintain the trust of the people in the conflict. Ombudsperson Ackermann had acted as an intermediary, during and after the Goodell Takeover, between students and administration negotiators. He violated the trust of these students by speaking despite their repeated requests that he refrain from doing so.

The written commentary to the Massachusetts State Advisory Committee for the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights shows the Ombudsperson repeatedly gave his personal opinion on the behavior of the student negotiators, the UMass administration negotiators, and ALANA students at UMass.

This violates his responsibility to remain neutral and impartial. He commented on views he believed the students had and misrepresented them. His commentary violated the confidentiality of both the administration and the students on a number of occasions.

The following are several excerpts from the statement he read and handed out at the hearing:

"On the Monday of the week of the Goodell events, I received a telephone call from Deputy Chancellor Williams informing me that a group of ALANA students and their supporters had taken over an area of the Goodell Building, and that the students were requesting my presence at the negotiation sessions." [This violates the confidentiality of Dr. Williams and the students.]

"I would note that the administration's willingness to accept the mediator proposed by the students is a very significant gesture of goodwill. I would also note that current student accusations of administration backsliding in the Collegian are unfortunate..." [This violates the confidentiality of the administration and offers an opinion favoring one side.]

"I believe, for example, that administrators do not fully grasp the way in which students using ALANA support services experience there [sic] personal counseling and emotional support... In the other direction, I believe that students do not really grasp the importance of the budget process that the University has put into operation in order to do some coherent rational financial planning..." [Here, again, we see judgements from the Ombudsperson about his opinion of the two sides.]

"Although he had the right to be present, by speaking there Ackermann violated a number of principles and practices of the UMass Ombuds Office and the Ombuds profession, as well as violating the trust of many students."

Khyati Joski

These and other comments by Ackermann reflect a violation of the trust placed in an esteemed office which is needed on this campus.

In my role as a student mediator at UMass, I am aware of the importance of neutrality in conflict resolution. This, as well as confidentiality, are crucial to be able to count on when one seeks problem-solving assistance as a student, faculty member, administrator and employee at this University.

No matter how important the proceedings are, Ombudsperson is required by the ethics of the office and profession to not violate these practices. In fact, there is a code which states that an Ombudsperson is not to participate in any formal public proceeding. If he did it to these particular students and administrators, couldn't it happen to you?

By stating that students saw lack of child care as a civil rights violation Ombudsperson Ackermann did several things. He: 1) misrepresented the student negotiators' views since they had not made that claim; 2) framed their claims about civil rights as frivolous and inaccurate; and 3) sided with the administration just when critical issues were about to be mediated. The presentation of the students as uninformed, lacking credible views and not accepting of the administration's efforts are all examples of an opinionated statement.

Neutrality does not allow room for the Ombudsperson's opinion, least of all in the sharing of confidential information at a public setting.

Student negotiators were undermined, but any one who knows about this ought to be concerned about trusting this Ombudsperson. Some may have continued to go to the Ombuds Office since no other office fulfills the same needs, but it has lost its credibility and can't be trusted to be confidential and impartial.

There is a code of ethics for the Ombuds field, and it states the accepted practices and responsibilities of Ombudspeople — yet Ombudsperson Ackermann blatantly violated it.

For all who are interested, copies of Ombudsperson Ackermann's commentary and The Ombuds Association Code of Ethics are available at GSS, SGA, and GEO offices.

Broadway comedy How to Succeed hits Concert Hall Sunday

How to Succeed In Business Without Really Trying opens up the Fall '97 Season at the Fine Arts Center this Sunday.

Looking for the easy way to get ahead in life? The hit Broadway comedy How to Succeed in Business Without Really Trying may have some answers for you.

This Sunday, the Fine Arts Center opens its 1997–98 season with the musical at 8 p.m. in the Concert Hall.

Originally opening in October of 1961 at the 46th Street Theatre, How to Succeed enjoyed a revival two years ago at the Richard Rodgers Theatre, with Matthew Broderick as its star. The revival picked up two Tony Awards in 1995 for Best Rival of a Musical, Best Director and Best Choreography.

How to Succeed is based on the novel by Shepard Mead.

Frank Loesser and Abe Burrows collaborated on the musical, with Loesser writing the music and lyrics and Burrows writing the book. The two writers had originally collaborated on another Broadway hit — Guys and Dolls. However, How to Succeed remains Loesser and Burrows' longest running Broadway production — with 1,417 performances to date.

How to Succeed is a rousing comedy describing how a window–washer named Finch, equipped only with his ambition and a book (How to Succeed...), makes it to the top of the corporate ladder.

Starting with an entry level job at World Wide Wicket, Finch catches the eye of Rosemary Pilkington, who has marriage on the mind.

However, in shows such as these, there is always competition for the hero. Such a character is born in the person of Bud Frump, the boss's nephew.

Suspense enters the light–hearted comedy when Finch realizes his love for Rosemary. Unfortunately, she turns him down when he proposes — realizing he cares more for the office than he does for her.

The New York Times describes How to Succeed in Business Without Really Trying as "a triumph of contemporary Broadway know–how! From its rousing overture until the foot–stomping finale, it's a non–stop delight."

Tickets are $40, and $20. Tickets for Five College students are $5 and for persons age 17 and under, $10. To order tickets for this performance or for more information, please call the Box Office at 545–2511 or (800) 999–UMAS. This performance is presented, in part, with the generous support of Fleet Bank and the Daily Hampshire Gazette.

Movie and trivia round–up

Kevin Spacey stars in the new film L.A. Confidential, now playing in theaters.

Adam Levine

The recent wave of the British Invasion has not limited itself merely to pop music, but rather has taken its toll in the world of independent cinema as well. Fans of British comedy can get a hearty dose of sophisticated humor this weekend, as both of Northampton's art–house theaters, the Academy of Music and the Pleasant St. Theater, are currently playing two films produced from across the great pond. Both are not exactly Monty Python style, but do however use comedy as a means of exploring contemporary and personal issues and should be decent examples of intriguing drama containing a comic twist.

Playing at Pleasant St. Theater is Mike Leigh's highly anticipated follow up to his multi–Oscar nominated hit, Secrets & Lies. His current film, Career Girls, is in typical Leigh fashion, which means its a story about average working people and the day–to–day obstacles they must overcome.

Career Girls is a film about two college friends, played by Katrin Cartlidge and Lynda Steadman, who after 10 years apart reunite to share the experiences of their 20s with each other and reminisce about their pasts. Like all of Leigh's movies, Career Girls was filmed strictly in an improvisational format with no script being used. This allows his actors the ability to speak their own lines for their characters and has become a trademark style of Leigh's work.

The Academy of Music is hosting The Full Monty, the highly praised new film from director Peter Catteneo which stars Robert Carlyle, best known as Begbie from Trainspotting). The Full Monty is the bizzare story of a group of recently laid off steel workers who decide to strip at a night club in order to make some cash. Shouldn't be quite as absurd as it may sound, but rather an interesting commentary on Britain's current recession, with a lot of well deserved laughs as well. Also playing in the area this weekend is Frank Oz' new film In & Out, which stars Kevin Kline as an "in the closet" high school teacher. Also, for fans of police dramas, check out L.A. Confidential, director Curtis Hanson's take on the new school noire genre. Guy Pearce and Russel Crowe play detectives in '50s Los Angeles along with Kevin Spacey and Kim Basinger in this suspense film about corrupt police officers. Check out full length reviews of each of these films later next week.

Well, enough with what's going on this weekend. Let's instead shift gears to some fun with film trivia. Alright all you amateur film buffs (I'm just trying to get you excited, don't take me seriously, no one else ever does), let's see if you can guess these quotes:

1. "Jimbo, I promise you son, I'll be the kind of father you want me to be."

2. Man– "A strange man defecated on my sister"
Woman– "Why?"
Man– "Is there any possible explanation I could give you to satisfy that, human sexuality is such a strange thing, which I guess is kind of good in a way."

3. "I'm going to Mexico to have the operation, so soon it will be goodbye penis!"

Homecoming 1997

Minutemen look for first win at Homecoming

By Corey Peter Goodman
Collegian Staff

Bumps the single best word to describe the University of Massachusetts football team's start to its 1997 season.

The Richmond Spiders were the first bump along the road. Despite edging the Spiders by a touchdown at the hall of the season opener, the Minutemen were outscored 21-0 in the second frame before surrendering, 21-6.

Disappointed with their lack of offensive firepower, UMass took the party to Orono, Maine for a week No. 2 clash with the Maine Black Bears. But the Minutemen saw just a clash of lightning, as they were crushed 49-6 by Maine in the middle of a driving thunder storm that halted the game for 39 minutes in the third quarter.

In week three, UMass found itself pitted against a strong James Madison team. The Minutemen were looking to shock the Dukes, who were coming off an upset victory over then- No. 6 East Tennessee State. UMass nearly achieved their goal.

With their best defensive effort in some time, the Minutemen held a powerful Dukes offense to just 13 points and 203 total yards. But the Minuteman offense never got on track as they fell, 13-10, dropping their record to 0-3.

Though the Minutemen haven't been able to notch a victory in the win column, the team has been centered around several individual success stories.

True freshman Marcel Shipp, a talented product from Passaic Tech High School in Paterson, N.J., has won the starting tailback slot from junior Jim Pizano. The two were platooning while junior Matt Jordan was recovering from a hamstring injury.

Shipp, who was recruited by Clemson and Memphis State before deciding on UMass, is the Minutemen's leading rusher. Shipp has carried the ball 27 times for 175 yards and a touchdown, 174 of which came in the last two games.

All-American candidate Khari Samuel is off to an outstanding start at inside linebacker for the Minutemen. Through three games, the junior has posted 45 tackles and one sack. Currently he is ranked seventh on the UMass top 10 list for solo stops with 16.5. He is on track to shatter the record, held by Vito Perrone with 261 tackles, by the end of this season.

Sophomore outside linebacker Chris Price has been a huge addition to the middle of the Minuteman defense. Price recorded 11 tackles in the loss against JMU, the third consecutive week he achieved double-digits. For the season, Price's 40 tackles ranks him third on the Minuteman roster.

Senior free safety Bryan Mooney is making the best of his fifth-year of eligibility after being medically redshirted in 1996. Mooney is second on the team in tackles with 42, highlighted by a 15-tackle effort last week at JMU.

Too often UMass has requested the services of junior punter/kicker Andy Maclay this season. Last week at JMU, Maclay punted nine times, placing three balls inside the 20- yard line and two inside the 5-yard line. Two weeks ago in Maine, Maclay became just the fourth punter in UMass history to eclipse the 6,000 yard mark.

While the ball hasn't bounced their way so far this season, UMass can head into tomorrow's homecoming game matchup with Rhode Island confident that history is on its side. Under head coach Mike Hodges, the Minutemen are 5- 0 in homecoming games. This includes upsets of No. 7 Delaware, 43-29, in 1993 and No. 12 William and Mary, 20-9, in 1995.

William Bulger begins annual Homecoming Weekend events

By Samantha Poulten
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts will celebrate the inauguration of President William P. Bulger, and confer the Chancellor's Medal on eight distinguished alumni, in a special ceremony in the Campus Center auditorium this afternoon at 3 p.m.

The public is invited to attend the event, which marks the beginning of the annual Homecoming Weekend at the University.

John Fuceda, the executive director of the alumni association, said that Homecoming Weekend is essential to the celebration of the past and present accomplishments of the University.

"The ceremonies give the Amherst campus the opportunity to celebrate our own successes, as well as President Bulger's inauguration," Fuceda said.

The opening ceremony will begin with a procession from the Fine Arts Center to the Campus Center Auditorium beginning at 2:30 p.m. Chancellor David K. Scott will welcome the crowd and give opening remarks while Bulger will deliver the principal address.

The Chancellor's Medal is the highest award given by the campus in recognition of service to the University. Recipients of the award are: Eric Chen-Chang, owner of Amherst Chinese Foods and Chen's Farms Inc.; Kathleen A. Cote, president and chief executive officer of Computervision; Evan S. Dobelle, president of Trinity College; Francis J. Gelligan, owner and the owner of Rite-Now Container Co.; Jerome Mileur, professor of political science and co-founder of the University's Jackie Robinson Initiative; E. Ann Sheridan, assistant dean of the School of Nursing; David Tirrell, Barret Professor of Polymer Science and Engineering; and Robert C. Wiesel, chairman and chief executive officer of Stone & Webster Engineering Corp.

The honoring of Bulger and the recipients of the Chancellor's Medal is one of the highlights of the UMass Festival, a day-long series of events spotlighting campus programs and departments.

This year also marks the 50th anniversary of the College of Engineering and the School of Management, and the 25th anniversary of the Women's Studies Program, the Everywoman's Center, and the Faculty Senate Council on the Status of Women.

The second day of Homecoming weekend begins with a wide variety of exhibits, workshops, and special presentations located at the numerous art galleries and halls around campus.

A dinner honoring the former chancellors and presidents of the University will highlight the second day of activities. The dinner is to be held tomorrow from 5:30-8 p.m. at the VIP Room at the Mullins Center. Presentations by both Scott and Bulger will be made during the dinner.

The former chancellors and presidents encompass more than 40 years of the University's history, beginning with President Jean Paul Mather, who served in the position from 1954-1960, and President John Lederle, who served from 1960-1970. Others to be honored include chancellors Oswald Tippo, 1970-1971, Randolph W. Bromery, 1971-1979, Henry Koffler, 1979-1982, Loren Baritz, 1982, Joseph Duffey, 1982-1991, and Richard O'Brian, 1991-1995. All but Tippo plan to attend.

"The accomplishments of these individuals are varied and unique to their times," Scott said in a press release. "Each of the chancellors and presidents were vital to the University in his own way."

The eight former chancellors and presidents constitute a living history of the University in the latter half of the century and, as such, are a resource to be honored and cherished."

"When I look around at the buildings, the faculty, staff, and the students who make up the University, I see living embodiments of the accomplishments of these individuals, accomplishments that they began, but that live on," Scott said in a press release.

The dinner will begin with a toast to the past and future of the University by Scott, and will continue with a presentation of the overall accomplishments of the administrators. The group will then be invited onto the stage to receive gifts and have their photographs taken. These portraits, together with a set of essays by each, will constitute an important documentation of the University's history.

"As we celebrate our past history and accomplishments, it is also the happy occasion to celebrate our new president of the University of Massachusetts system, President William Bulger," Scott said.

Carroll settling in with Patriots

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBORO, Mass. — The name of Bill Parcells isn't heard so much around the New England Patriots these days.

That's what one win over their former coach and a 4-0 start will do. Pete Carroll has put his own mark on the team Parcells took to last season's Super Bowl, and it's been impressive. The Patriots lead the NFL in scoring and have allowed the second fewest points per game.

Yet Carroll knows the team has plenty of mistakes it can eliminate once it gets more experience with the systems he's installed. And he admits that he can improve as a coach when the team resumes play after this week's bye.

"I've been in the middle somewhere," Carroll said. "I've been watching it. I've done some good things and I've done some poor things.

"Fortunately, we have a bunch of guys to make plays and bail me out. Our staff has done a nice job working with my craziness."

That self-deprecating, not entirely accurate assessment is typical of the relaxed Carroll. He really would have needed a supportive staff if the Patriots hadn't beaten Parcells' New York Jets 27-24 in overtime in the third game of the season.

He knows that would have revived talk he couldn't lead the team as well as the volatile Parcells did.

The victory was "obviously a major impact for the perception of our fans on our regime," Carroll said.

The Patriots get another chance to make that impact in their next game, a Monday night showdown with the Denver Broncos that could be a preview of the AFC Championship game.

The Broncos, who play Atlanta on Sunday, should be 5-0 by the time the Patriots come to town. The combined record of New England's first four opponents is 3-13 and three of those four games were at home. Five of the next seven are on the road.

The Patriots have lost nine consecutive games in Denver since their last win in 1969. They faced each other the past two seasons in Foxboro, and Denver dominated both games, 37-3 and 34-8.

A similar result would be especially shocking since Carroll is a defense-minded coach who coordinated San Francisco's outstanding units the past two years.

"When we implemented our defense in minicamps, I knew we were going to be an aggressive-style defense," cornerback Jimmy Hitchcock said. "I knew that we would get off to a great start, because we're a year older on defense."

That defense is getting noticed even though the offense has been brilliant behind Drew Bledsoe (12 touchdown passes, three interceptions and three sacks) and Curtis Martin (118.5 yards rushing per game).

"That's nice," said linebacker Ted Johnson, who has two of the team's NFL-high 21 sacks, "because we've always been in the shadow of the offense."

The defense has done that without end Willie McGinest, who led the team in sacks the past two seasons. He played sparingly in just one game before sustaining a knee injury, although he could return against Denver.

The Patriots also have played most of the season without their best receiver, Terry Glenn, who suffered an ankle injury in the opener. Carroll expects him to be at full strength for the Broncos.

The coach is surprised the team has done so well without them.

"We're looking forward to the time when we get these guys back," Carroll said. "They'll make a difference. ... It's a difference when we game-plan with Terry. It's a difference when we game-plan with Willie and it'll be great to have them healthy."

Carroll's offense is more diverse than the one Parcells used.

Martin no longer comes off the field on passing downs and has more options to pick his spots on running plays. And Bledsoe has quickly become comfortable in a system that allows him to scan all his receivers rather than concentrating on one, then looking elsewhere if the first one is covered.

"We have a team with a lot of confidence and an ability to handle a lot of different situations," Carroll said. "It would be great to go to Denver and to win that game, but we won't hold that as the ultimate challenge.

"We'll continue to shoot for that perfect game and maybe someday we'll get one."

Kemp dealt to Cleveland to quicken pace

In a stunning three-team deal, Shawn Kemp was traded last night to the Cleveland Cavaliers.

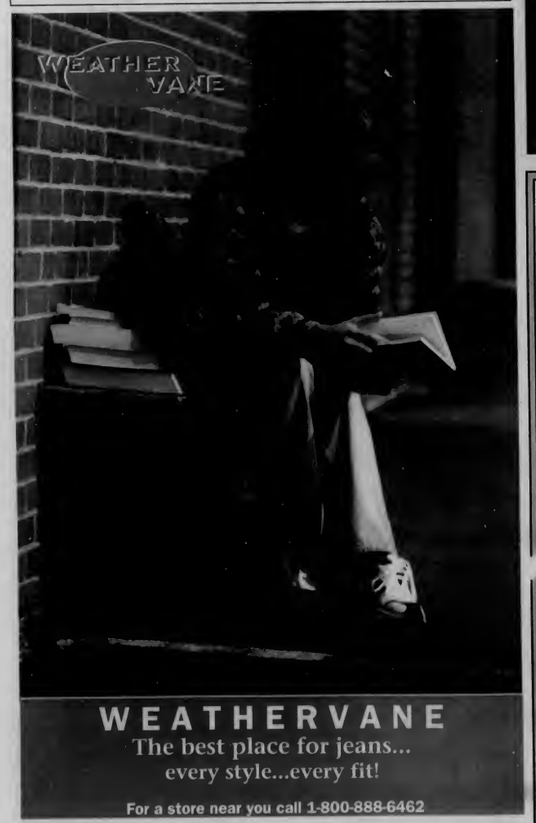
Cleveland and coach Mike Fratello will now have an almost entire new starting five. Gone from the slow-down crew that averaged just 87.5 points per game — one-tenth of a point shy of the NBA record held by the 1954-55 Milwaukee Hawks — are Terrell Brandon, Tyrone Hill, Chris Mills and Bobby Phills.

In Kemp, the Cavs get a marquee attraction who will be expected to inject some excitement into the league's dullest team. The five-time All-Star had his best year in 1995-96, when the Sonics went to the NBA Finals, as he averaged 19.6 points and 11.4 rebounds for a team that won 64 regular-season games.

Kemp slumped to averages of 18.7 and 10.0 last season, and his constant sullen behavior and habitual lateness became a problem while the Sonics were on the way to being eliminated by the Houston Rockets in the second round of the playoffs.

Walker stated that he wouldn't trade Kemp unless he got an All-Star in return, and he got his wish by acquiring Vin Baker along with Sherman Douglas from Milwaukee.

Cleveland completed the trade by sending Brandon and Hill to the Bucks.



Baker, the four-year veteran and three-time All-Star, is one of the league's best low post players — a 6-foot-11 power forward whose averages of 21.0 points and 10.3 rebounds were an almost identical match to his numbers from the previous season. Last week, the 25-year-old Baker was selected — along with Brandon — for the 1998 U.S. World Championship Team.

Douglas, an eight-year veteran point guard, will be joining his fourth NBA team.

Brandon, who will make $1.8 million this season before receiving a $7 million balloon payment next season, is one of the best point guards in the league. A steady shooter with quickness, smarts and poise, he averaged 19.5 points and 6.3 assists last season and received his second All-Star selection.

Men's XC takes on Champions

By Seth Koenig
Collegian Correspondent

Massachusetts men's cross country team will head to New York tomorrow for the 1997 Meet of Champions. This meet figures to be the biggest meet of the season so far for the young UMass runners, who have used the previous two meets as learning experiences.

Men's Cross Country
Meet of Champions
Saturday

On Sept. 13, the Minutemen split a meet between Iona and Northeastern. During the meet, held at Franklin Park in Boston, UMass showed that it could compete at a high level despite the team's lack of experience. Freshman Brendan Sullivan placed ninth and sophomore Peter Gleason placed sixth to lead the Minuteman pack.

Last weekend in Vermont, the team revealed a more unstable side. Sullivan dropped to 21st place, and only one runner managed to place in the top 10 — senior Ryan Carrara, who has been the most consistent runner of the season for the UMass squad. The Minutemen placed fourth out of five teams overall, and seemed much more exhausted towards the end of the race than the week before.

"In any athletic team, a young group can have a good meet, and others where they fracture," coach Ken O'Brien said. "I felt we'd do the same as we did in the first meet, but we didn't do as well (in the second meet). I'm unsure as to how we'll do this week, we bounce around a lot."

At the upcoming Meet of Champions, the Minutemen will prove for certain which team they will consistently be.

The meet will be a challenge, featuring Connecticut, Miami, Coastal Carolina, Life, Yale, Dartmouth, Georgetown, Harvard, Wake Forest, Army and Iona — the latter six all nationally ranked. The course, at Van Cortland Park, will also test the runners, because it's one of the oldest and most difficult in the nation.

"Twelve quality teams, competing hard, on a difficult course. We'll see how we can handle ourselves, being the third meet, with many above average schools," O'Brien said.

"It's a very tough course," Sullivan said. "I've run there in high school. A lot of the guys on the team know it's a tough course. The last couple of meets were pretty flat."

The Minutemen look forward to the challenge that awaits, and seem anxious for the big meet.

"It's a great course to run on. As you cross the finish line you can turn back at times over the past century," O'Brien said.

Garciaparra smoothly joining elite

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

BOSTON — In spring training, Nomar Garciaparra handled controversy as smoothly as he handles a bat and glove.

Boston already had an outstanding shortstop, John Valentin, and he didn't want to move to second base to make room for the rookie.

Valentin had his own goal, "to be one of the best shortstops the Red Sox ever had."

There was little doubt Garciaparra would get that chance instead, but he didn't aggravate a touchy situation. Under the glare of the spotlight and the Florida sun, he simply said the right things and made the right plays.

"My job is to go out there and play wherever they put me and do the best I can," he said before the season began.

On Sunday, his season ends, a season in which Red Sox fans had little to cheer but Garciaparra. He dazzled them with his fielding, set records with his hitting and appears to be a shoo-in for AL rookie of the year.

"If Nomar had come along 15, 20 years ago, I'm sure Cal Ripken would have been glad to move over to third base," says Johnny Pesky, whose 55-year-old record of 205 hits by a Red Sox rookie was threatened by Garciaparra. "When you get a talent like that, he has to play."

He has played so well that he even broke Ted Williams team rookie record of 344 total bases with two doubles on Sept. 19. But the Red Sox lost the game.

"What he has done this year," Pesky says, "you'd have to say he is a perfect player."

As teammates continue to collect souvenir balls for him to mark each milestone, he still looks one characteristic of stardom, an inflated ego.

Breaking Williams' record "means a lot," Garciaparra said. "Right now, I'm more upset that we lost."

That's more than a stock answer from the 24-year-old shortstop with exceptional maturity for a rookie. Spending three years at Georgia Tech before turning pro helped. Garciaparra is devoted to the sport he loves and consumed by a desire for consistency. In the batter's box, he goes through the same routine on every at-bat — tugging his gloves, tapping his toes.

It is more than just superstition.

"I just like things tight before I exert energy," he said, "my toes at the end of my shoes and then, when I have gloves on my hands, the same thing. I'm just pushing and pulling them down and then I'm just getting ready to hit."

Garciaparra broke the major league record for RBIs by a leadoff hitter and set the AL mark for longest hitting streak by a rookie, 30 games. He has the most hits in the league and also could lead in runs and triples.

Power and speed? He had 29 homers and 22 stolen bases going into the regular season's final weekend.

In the field, he has exceptional quickness, sure hands and a powerful arm.

Is there anything he needs to work on?

Always a physical match, the Brown defense held junior Brian Stahl to just two goals last weekend. Despite the slowed goal-scoring place from the All-American, he still leads the Minutemen with 36 points, double that of Rich Slingluff, next on the list.

Unlike the all-time series with the Bears, the Minutemen have been rather successful against the Eagles and Engineers. UMass holds a combined 41-3 advantage over the two squads, both series dating back to the inception of the Minuteman program.

From Poolside... Aldo Roman, known for his defensive prowess, is second on the team in goals with 16, picking up some slack for a UMass offense that has a below average .444 shooting percentage... the Minutemen had a players only practice the other day... Marc Staudenbauer is back on track after last season's nagging thumb injury. He is in good position to surpass the late Greg Menton on the all-time percentage list. Menton's record stands at .559 while Staudenbauer is second currently at .556 — so far this season he's 7-for-12 (.583).

Volleyball digs into A–10 slate this weekend

By Jamie Jee
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts volleyball team begins its Atlantic 10 Conference road play this weekend at St. Bonaventure and Duquesne. The team will take on the Bonnies at the Reilly Center tonight and Duquesne tomorrow night.

The Minutewomen will look to continue their success over both teams holding records of 12–1 versus the Bonnies and 7–4 against the Lady Dukes.

Volleyball
Massachusetts @ St. Bonaventure
Today

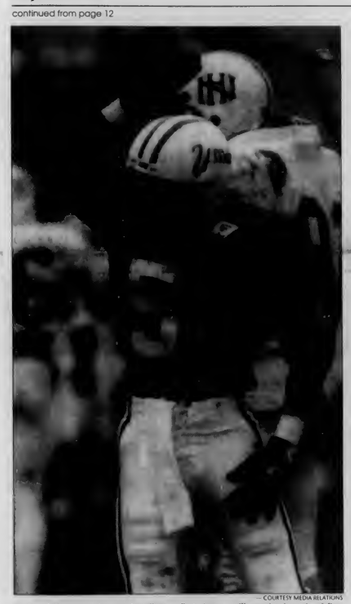
"We are usually stronger against St. Bonaventure but they are a scrappy team," UMass coach Bonnie Kenny said. The Bonnies' key player is senior Nikki Renninger who is coming off an eight kill performance against Buffalo.

"Duquesne is just as strong as us in a lot of aspects and the match should be a battle. They have some very good players and have already faced some good teams in the pre-season. Their team is as young as ours, but they are still big and play very physical," Kenny said.

UMass won their first games in the A-10 last weekend knocking off a strong Dayton team in the process. In the victory over Dayton, freshman setter Jennifer Drennan set the all-time UMass single-match record in assists with 83 and is now the No. 1 freshman in assists, UMass set a new team record as well with 92.

Senior middle blocker Michelle Paciorek will be closing in on the all-time marks this weekend for both assisted and solo blocks. She needs nine to surpass graduate Dionne Nash's block assist record of 265 and just two solo blocks to surpass Rachel Sky's mark of 71.

Senior outside-hitter Lesley Nolan, certainly among the elite in UMass volleyball history, became just the second UMass player to record 1,000 kills and 1,000 digs in a career. She is second only to Nash in career kills and digs.



Sophomore middle blocker Jill Meyers was named UMass/WHMP Athlete of the Week and currently leads the team in kills, blocks, and hitting percentage. Sophomore setter Kari Hogancamp has been playing well and leads the nation in digs with Nolan currently sixth. Freshmen Rebecca Hassen and Emilie Erbe look to contribute this weekend after being released to play. Both have been limited this season with injuries.

"We will have to work hard as we get into mid-conference play. We are getting stronger but we cannot be complacent. Discipline on defense and team chemistry will be important this week and down the road," Kenny said.

passing game," Hodges said. "We aren't getting anything out of that."

On the other hand, the Rams are known for their passing assault. Led by quarterback Billy Jack Haskins, the Rams will attempt to spread out the Minutemen secondary and throw against its weak spots. Haskins has thrown for 615 yards in three games. What is most impressive is that he has spread out 50 completions with nine different receivers.

"They love to throw the football," Hodges said. "They have a very talented quarterback. We've got to make the plays when they do throw it."

If the Minutemen can slow down URI's passing game, it will unravel the Rams entire offensive scheme. The Rams rushing game leaves much to be desired. James Jenkins is their only running back who has consistently carried the ball for significant yardage. In three games he has rushed for 232 yards, averaging 4.0 yards per gain. However, apart from Jenkins the Rams have no depth at the running positions.

On UMass' defense, a few players have proven to be indispensable. Khari Samuel, who seems to be in on every play, has averaged 15 tackles per game. Chris Price, the sophomore linebacker playing next to Samuel is third on the team with 40 tackles, 16 of which are unassisted. Bryan Mooney has been a big surprise. The safety is second on the team with 42 tackles. These three players count for over 33 percent of the teams tackles.

"We've got to shut other teams running game down," Hodges said. "You're not going to win games if the other teams run up and down the field on you."

No matter how UMass' defense fares, the whole game will come down to whether or not its offense can sustain a drive, establish a running game and spread out the Rams defense with a passing game. So far, neither of these things have been consistently accomplished.

"These kids need a win and want a win very badly," Hodges said.

Hodges

"Play like a Champion — Today." Below that credo is a list of each year the team won a YanCon title — obviously representing the tradition and excellence for which the Minutemen strive.

It has a steady stream of dates starting in 1960 and ending abruptly in 1990.

In 1991, Reid had a 4–7 campaign, then left for the University of Richmond. Hodges was promoted to head coach and began his string of mediocrity in 1992.

It's now 1997.

Still laughing?

The UMass Athletic Department boasts the Minutemen being the most successful football program in YanCon history. In fact, they've won 17 titles, more than any other program in the 50-year history of the now defunct conference, which gave way to the growing A-10 just this year.

In addition, they have the most wins in YanCon history (159) — a history of which Hodges is a small part.

He has won 21 of those league games during his stay in the Valley, yet not one of those victories has yielded a conference title.

No UMass football coach since Charlie O'Rourke (1952- '59) has had more than two seasons between championship seasons with the exception of Hodges.

He's a great guy — as well-liked as his predecessor Reid was — but the results aren't there. No championships and consistent averageness are not earmarks of a football program building towards making the jump to Division I-A.

Hodges' contract is up after this season, and it shouldn't be renewed.

After starting his head coaching career at UMass with a combined two-year record of 15-6 (a record attained with mostly Reid-recruited players) he has gone 5–6, 6–5 and 6–5 respectively, and is well on his way to one of the worst campaigns in UMass football history.

He is already 0–3 this fall, with games against nationally ranked Villanova and Delaware ahead, not to mention tough regional opponents New Hampshire and UConn.

Athletic Director Bob Marcum was hired in 1993 because the administration believed his experience (tenures at Kansas and South Carolina as an A.D.) could help build the athletic department into one of the nation's best. It's hard to comprehend why he has let the football team continue to slide away from its past glory for so long.

It has become increasingly apparent, though, that at least somebody is fed up with the second-rate performance of Hodges' squad over the last six seasons — the fans.

McGuirk Stadium is never full. Not even close.

And most of the people that the football games actually do draw scatter to their seats throughout the first half and settle in only minutes before halftime. That's when the marching band takes the field, and the football team is nowhere in sight.

They know quality when they see it.

The fans apparently come to see a group that performs well together and is led by someone who is clearly at the top of his field. And then, a lot of them flee towards the hot dog stands before the second half starts.

Hodges, without a doubt, is a nice guy. Anybody who has met him knows he cares about this school, and the kids on his football team. But Leo Durocher told the world that "Nice guys finish last." The Minutemen are on their way.

Will you still be laughing?

Owls swoop into Amherst for A–10 tilt

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

In just their second conference game of the season, the Minutewomen will have to focus on one of their toughest league opponents as Temple visits Richard F. Garber Field Sunday at noon.

"Conference games are always important," Massachusetts field hockey coach Patty Shea said. "You always have to put your focus on the games against teams in your league."

Temple could prove to be a tougher challenge than its 3–4 record indicates. The Owls return all 11 starters from last year's squad including a talented forward line and a game–tested goalie.

"Temple has some key players we really have to look at," Shea said. "There is speed on their forward line and they have a strong midfield. They have gotten good production from their forwards."

Sunday

Two key players UMass will have to mark closely are Cherifa Nouri and Claudia Ovchinnikoff. Both earned spots in the Atlantic-10 overall scoring top five this week with their efforts over non–conference opponents. Nouri ranks fourth with four goals and an assist, while Ovchinnikoff claims the No. 5 spot with the same total.

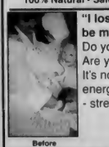
Along with the two top–scoring Owls, Katrina Wolfe has consistently helped on offense, offering up five assists on the season.

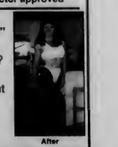
The Minutewomen however are not lacking a scoring punch of their own. Junior Erica Johnston, who had three goals in UMass' 5–0 win over Rhode Island, sits atop the overall scoring list with 10 goals and one assist. Fellow junior Vicky Browne follows in the No. 2 spot as she has tallied five goals — including two against URI — and five assists.

But where Temple's scoring depth chart abruptly falls off after Wolfe, UMass has a balanced attack that features five other players on the same list.

The Owls, though, do have the advantage of having an experienced goalie in their cage. Deb Brown has recorded three shutouts and made 54 saves in seven games while allowing just nine goals.

"Their goalie is very tough," Shea said. "Brown has done a great job for them, and if you look at their loses, they are all to quality teams."





Two of those losses — a 2–1 loss at Duke and a 1–0 defeat at James Madison — have come in the Owls last two games. But Temple does have a chance to even their record before visiting UMass when they face URI Saturday.

Horoscopes

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — It will be up to you to do what is right today; no one else is likely to jump on the bandwagon, at least until you've shown what is possible.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — You and a partner have something really special going right now, and you'll want to maintain it as long as possible. Avoid being stubborn!

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Your passions may be quite near the surface today, but you can control yourself quite well when necessary, with the help of a friend.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You may have to go without the advice of a special friend on whom you've come to depend. Obviously, you've learned a lot!

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — You will be attracted to something that others have warned you against today, but real dangers are few at this time.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — Keep your eyes and ears open today for any signs that things are not going precisely according to plan. Quick fixes can work!

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — As determined as you are, you may find that it is impossible to succeed in a certain venture without making one or two compromises.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You are yearning for something that is still out of reach. Perhaps it's time to ask yourself why you cannot get any closer.

NBC takes bite out of Albert

There's a time in everybody's life when people do things that they wish they'd never done.

In sixth grade, I threw a piece of metal out of the boy's room without knowing that the janitor's car was below. In eighth grade, I threw a ball bearing against a wall, neglecting to realize that it would bounce back and shatter the window behind me.

Marv Albert is probably feeling like I did.

Marv has done some naughty things.

But has he been naughty before?

I'll bet he has. I'll bet Marv is into puppy training and cross dressing. Not only that, that girl had been with him before. Look, Marv's not that slick, and anyone can see past that rug on top of his head.

And the foul!

He's now been fired from NBC, and may serve time for a little late night snack.

YES!... Marv is every sports broadcasters hero.

And he's hearing it from the crowd!

Around the Horn

• Nomar Garciaparra... MVP?

I don't think so.

However, he better get some votes.

By far, the rookie in the red socks has been one of the top 10 baseball players of the year. He's got 29 homers, 96 RBI 22 stolen bases, batting .303, leads the AL in hits and runs and on top of that has made 20 errors at the shortstop position where his range is phenomenal.

Has anyone forgotten that he's still a rookie?

It almost seems like winning the AL Rookie of the Year is just assumed. We Want More!

• Two weeks from now there could be a preview for the AFC and NFC Championships. Tampa Bay heads up to the frozen tundra of Lambeau Field to play Green Bay while Denver plays host to New England on Monday night.

We'll talk more about this on Thursday, but let's just say that the two teams that met last year in the Super Bowl look like they're in pretty good shape to do it again. I don't care how talented Denver is, they don't have what it takes to win the whole thing. And Tampa will run out of steam sooner or later.

• The Ryder Cup is this weekend.

For all of you who only pay attention to the baseball, basketball and football scene, this is golf.

I know, I know, you don't want to hear about golf.

Well, this isn't your column, is it.

I'm not going to bore you with mindless talk on how Bernard Langer is going to putt really well this weekend. What I am going to say is that Tiger Woods, Phil Mickelson and Justin Leonard had better kick some major ass.

Two of these guys have won majors this year (Woods, Leonard), and the lefty (Mickelson) has been the most successful twenty-something golfer over the last five years.

If these three bring the Ryder trophy back to the U.S., then they will truly have proven that they are legitimate golfers.

Even the Masters isn't as pressure packed as defending your country against another continent.

• The UMass football team is trying really hard.

I swear.

I know most of you just think they suck and will never walk down to the stadium to watch a game, but if you got off your lazy tush and went down there you might find out that there are some really talented players in the maroon and white.

Did you know that NFL scouts come to watch junior linebacker Khari Samuel practice every week. He may be one of those rare Division I-AA draftees.

Go to Homecoming tomorrow and support your team!

• Another question that was posed to me yesterday was, "Do you think if Drew Bledsoe continues to play the way he has for the rest of his career, will he be revered like Bobby Orr, Larry Bird, and Ted Williams are?"

My answer right now is no. Don't get me wrong, Drew is an amazing quarterback and still hasn't been given the respect he should have, but, and it's a really big but, he plays football. Football players wear helmets and are never personalized like other athletes. He's great and will be remembered, but 20 years from now he won't be held up as high as those other guys that changed their respective sports.

UMass puts Homecoming streak on line

By Jonathan M. Place
Collegian Staff

Tomorrow, the Massachusetts football team (0–3) hosts Rhode Island (1–2) in the annual Homecoming game. Kickoff is scheduled for 1 p.m. at Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

If history is on UMass' side, there should be no problem against the Rams. Under coach Mike Hodges, the Minutemen are a perfect 5–0 in Homecoming games. However, like any intelligent football fan, one knows that winning is never that simple, and winning is something that UMass hasn't done all season.

"We haven't had that much success against Rhode Island in the last couple of years," coach Mike Hodges said. "We've got to go out there and get it done. This is the game that most of the alumni come back to see. We've got to perform better than we have been in order to be successful."

Homecoming 97
Massachusetts vs Rhode Island
Saturday 1 p.m.

Last year, the Minutemen fell hard to the Rams, 41–21. Turnovers were the killer. Seventeen of URI's points came off of turnovers. It's that sort of football that UMass is trying to eliminate.

After dropping the first three games to Richmond, Maine and James Madison, the Minutemen are looking for anything that can bring this losing streak to a halt. One move that UMass has made to try and improve a stale offense is the switch of offensive coordinators. Doug Berry, who has been offensive coordinator for the past seven seasons, was demoted to running backs coach.

Bob Colbert will replace Berry in tomorrow's game against the Rams. On top of controlling the offense, Colbert retains his position as quarterbacks coach.

"I made the change because we're looking for a little jumpstart — the kids needed that and our football team needed that," Hodges said. "Bob is working with Jeff Smith on a daily basis. He knows what he likes to do and what he's good at doing and I thought it might make us better at the passing game."

Marcel Shipp has been the story thus far for the Minutemen's quiet offensive season. Shipp has 180 all-purpose yards over the last three games, 179 of which came in the last two.

Smith has passed for 268 yards this year, with one touchdown and eight interceptions. So far, Smith's favorite receiver has been Kerry Taylor, who leads the team with eight completions for 103 yards and the team's only receiving touchdown, which came in week No. 1 against Richmond. It will be Smith, Shipp and Taylor who will need to lead UMass if it intends to win.

"What we've got to work on is our

Hodges' 0–3 Minutemen are no joke anymore

By Fred Hurlbrink, Jr.

It's just not funny anymore.

The ever-increasing plight of our oh-so-beloved Massachusetts football team has been a running joke on campus for a couple seasons now, but there comes a time when you hear a punch line so many times that you just stop laughing at it.

Since a 41–20 drubbing of Buffalo on Oct. 19, 1996, the Minutemen have lost six of their last seven games, and they've only actually been competitive in one of those half- dozen.

Not funny.

In the six losses they have scored 49 points to the opposition's 175. The one victory in that forgettable span was the unforgettable, and miraculous, come-from-behind win over Connecticut (39–38) to end last season.

In some circles, the talk was that win saved head coach Mike Hodges' job.

Should it have?

Since Hodges took over for the very popular Jim Reid in 1992, the Minutemen have posted a winning 32–25 record overall and a 21–22 Yankee Conference (now Atlantic 10) mark.

Not bad. But since Hodges came aboard, certain things have changed for the once storied UMass football program.

In Reid's first season — 1986 — UMass went 8–3 and won the program's 15th YanCon title, picking up right where the likes of Bob Pickett (4 YC titles), Dick MacPherson (4 YC titles) and Vic Fusia (5 YC titles) left off.

Reid would go on to lead his charges to two more conference banners in his six-year tenure with the Minutemen, and in his next two championship seasons, Reid brought his Minutemen to the Division I-AA playoffs for the third and fourth times in UMass football history.

Above the gate at the back of Warren McGuirk Alumni Stadium where the football team enters before each game is hung a plaque that reads:

Big adventure awaits UM soccer in Texas

By Kathleen Ralls

Pee Wee Herman and his big adventure took him on a whirlwind visit through Vanilla Ice's home state (Texas, as if you didn't know) where he danced in clogs on a bar to Tequila and discovered the Alamo didn't have a basement. This was all a search in vain for his beloved bike.

SMU Tournament
Saturday and Sunday

The Massachusetts's women's soccer team has slightly less spastic expectations when they travel south for the Southern Methodist University Tournament at Dallas this weekend. UMass' goal is to return 2-0 off the weekend in preparation for upcoming league games.

Preceding a tough, but not debilitating 2–1 loss to Connecticut on Tuesday, the Minutewomen still dream of sugar plums, Atlantic 10 and national championships as well with a 6–1 record.

UMass offers a buffet-style offense, where forwards and defenders share the duties. The Minutewomen's defense has been as steady as ever, only allowing three goals this year with the impressive play of goaltender Danielle Dion. This will also be a homecoming for the Houston native, junior Amanda Thompson.

Tonight serves the first game as UMass challenges the host, SMU, in an evening affair at 8:30 p.m. The Lady Mustangs are a well-balanced mix of freshmen youth and senior experience all contributing. Coach Greg Ryan, an alum of SMU, is in his second season with an overall record of 17–8–4. The Lady Mustangs stand at 6-2 with wins over No. 4 William & Mary, 2–1, an impressive 1–0 victory over the No. 16 Stanford Cardinal and another 1–0 win against No. 18 Vanderbilt. SMU has proven early that they are prepared for high-caliber teams — including a 3–0 loss to nationally ranked North Carolina for their season opener.

Southern Methodist's leading scorer is senior midfielder Marci Miller, with five goals and two assists for 12 points. Trailing her closely is freshman defender MaryAnn Means with five goals and senior Kim Brown and senior captain Emily Rogers, both with seven points a piece. SMU has five others who provide scoring versatility thus posing a possible threat to UMass. Junior goalkeeper Erin Poole has been the mainstay for the defense.

On Sunday afternoon the Minutewomen return to action when they attack the Golden Bears at 1 p.m. This is coach Kevin Boyd's first year at the helm of Cal who was 13–3–2 in the '96 campaign. California has a 3–3–1 record with a recent 2–1 defeat to No. 4 Santa Clara this past Sunday.

Water polo set for hunt in CWPA

By Fred Hurlbrink, Jr.
Collegian Staff

Until Queens College beat up the Massachusetts men's water polo team on Sept. 13, the Minutemen had never lost a regular season league tournament game.

The Eastern Water Polo Association had been holding league tournaments since 1993 in order to determine positioning for the playoffs according to win–loss records.

All of a sudden the name changes to the Collegiate Water Polo Association, and the Minutemen (7–2) are vulnerable.

Men's Water Polo
CWPA
League Tournament
Saturday

The loss to Queens — which has become a serious UMass rival — was the first loss of the season for the Minutemen who also suffered a set back last weekend when Brown bounced them, 10–6 in Providence. In addition, the Queens loss was only the fourth home loss in the history of the Minuteman program. Ironically, two of those other home defeats were at the hands of Brown.

UMass looks to at least get back to its accustomed streak of league dominance this weekend in a CWPA league tilt in Cambridge.

In a convenient twist of fate, the Bears of Brown will be on the docket for the Minutemen, along with Boston College and M.I.T.

The UMass–Brown series has been hotly and very evenly contested for many years. In 30 matches between the two Eastern water polo stalwarts, the Minutemen have managed 16 victories to the Bears' 14, but have won nine of the last 10.

New voting rules approved in Hong Kong

HONG KONG (AP) — Hong Kong's lawmakers approved an election law yesterday that reduces the number of people who can vote, a change certain to weaken the democracy movement.

The Beijing-installed legislators voted 29-9 with 11 abstentions in favor of the new voting rules after an 18-hour marathon debate. The Legislative Council Bill establishes the rules for May elections, the first to be held in Hong Kong since Britain returned it to Chinese rule July 1.

Democracy activists in Hong Kong sharply criticized the bill for narrowing the franchise. They said the United States and Britain have pressed for fair elections as early as possible.

Debate over elections and the pace at which democracy should be introduced to Hong Kong marred Chinese-British relations during the last years of British rule and dashed hopes for a entirely smooth handover.

British Governor Christopher Patten expanded the electorate for the last elections in 1995, but an infuriated Beijing disbanded the legislature when it resumed control of Hong Kong. It installed an unelected, provisional body, which is stacked with China supporters.

Dream of own home more attainable

CAMBRIDGE (AP) — More and more of the nation's minority residents and immigrants are sharing the thrills and headaches of homeownership.

Housing researchers and politicians say the trend is a bright spot in an overall encouraging assessment of the nation's housing industry in a report released today by Harvard University's Joint Center for Housing Studies.

Minority households have grown to account for nearly 30 percent of the county's new homeowners, according to the center's annual "State of the Nation's Housing" study. In many areas, they are anchoring the first-time home-buyer market.

"What many forecasters have failed to recognize is the emergence of this important minority home-buying market," said William Apgar, the center's executive director.

In Washington, Housing Secretary Andrew Cuomo called the findings "very good news for America and great news for American families."

"But, as we continue to open the doors of opportunity for more Americans, we recognize that barriers of discrimination remain and they must be knocked down," he said.

However the report said as government restructures welfare and housing assistance programs, conditions are worsening for low-income families unable to buy into the market.

Accident at greenhouse on campus results in death of UMass student

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

Junior Adam G. Prentice, 21, of Hyannis, died early Saturday morning as a result of injuries sustained when he fell through the glass of a greenhouse roof near the Morrill Science Center.

According to Associate Vice Chancellor and Dean of Students Jo-Anne Vanin, police were called to the greenhouse at approximately 1:30 a.m. when a door alarm in Morrill was activated.

Prentice was discovered alone and with no witnesses.

He was immediately transported to Cooley Dickinson Hospital in Northampton, then to Baystate Medical Center in Springfield, where he was pronounced dead.

"This is a very tragic death. We are very concerned about the UMass community and especially close friends of Adam's," Vanin said at a press conference Saturday afternoon.

Prentice, who lived in Field Residence Hall, was a computer science and engineering major.

Vice Chancellor for Student Affairs, Tom Robinson, informed the campus community of Prentice's death via e-mail.

"This is a time for us to reach out to each other as we reflect on this very sad accident," he wrote.

Prentice's autopsy was scheduled for Saturday at Providence Hospital in Holyoke.

According to a spokesman from the medical examiner's office, "the cause of death was determined to be massive bleeding."

The office is awaiting toxicology results to determine if alcohol or drugs were a factor in the accident.

In an effort to help students deal with Prentice's death, meetings are being held for all floors in Field. Prentice lived on the third floor.

"It is very difficult to make sense of a loss of someone with such promise," Vanin said.

Vanin and Robinson want all students to be aware of other resources available on campus to help deal with this tragedy.

Mental health services can be reached at 545–2337, Dean of Students at 545–2684, and Public Safety at 545–2121.

Police officials were not available for comment.

According to Vanin, police are investigating and are working to reconstruct the accident. They are looking for information from anyone that was with Prentice or talked to him throughout the day.

Anyone who has information should call Public Safety at 545–2121.

Funeral arrangements have not been released.

Small voter turnout nullifies elections, reopens nominations

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

Last week's Student Government Association (SGA) elections have been nullified due to a lack of student voting.

The SGA constitution states that five percent of the student body must vote in order to have the election be valid. Nine hundred five votes were needed for the election to be official. Only 877 students voted.

"Due to the fact that we didn't get five percent of the student body to vote we had to annul these elections," Election Chancellor Jodi Bailey said.

This has never happened before and is blamed on the fact that there was not enough advertising publicizing the elections.

"We were restructuring for the new semester and our minds weren't totally focused on the election. That's our fault," Bailey said.

Nominations have been reopened today and will close at 5 p.m. on Wednesday, Oct. 15. Candidates who have already passed in nomination papers do not need to re-nominate themselves.

Six referendum questions will be reworked and the student body will be given more information about each question and what a yes or no vote means.

"The referendum questions will be revised and put back on the ballot with more information going out to the student body about what they're about," Bailey said.

As one way to promote more campus wide voting, the SGA will be funding part of the supplies for this election. Each candidate will be receiving one ream of paper, which can make approximately 500 posters.

"We're redoing them [the elections] because we think it would be unfair to represent only a small portion of the campus. We want all the students voices to be heard," Bailey said.

Bulger honored on campus Friday

Convocation for new president kicks off "Milestone Weekend"

By Tamar Carroll
Collegian Staff

In a kickoff to Homecoming Weekend, President William M. Bulger was honored at the University of Massachusetts Amherst campus this past Friday afternoon.

Following a formal academic procession through campus, Bulger's inauguration as president of UMass on Sept. 18 in Boston was recognized at a special UMass Festival Convocation held in the Campus Center Auditorium.

Chancellor David K. Scott offered opening remarks at the convocation, which was attended by several hundred faculty and community members, as well as State Senator Stanley Rosenberg (D–Amherst) and Board of Trustee vice chair Michael Foley.

"This weekend we celebrate the voices of our past in our Milestone Weekend. It is our golden anniversary as a University, the 50th anniversary of the College of Engineering and the School of Management and the 25th anniversary of the Women's Studies Program and the Everywoman's Center," Scott said. "President Bulger has been chosen to unify the voices of our past and sculpt them into a model public institution for the future."

Scott went on to highlight the recent high rankings of UMass in national publications such as Money Magazine and U.S. News and World Reports, and said he is confident the University will be admitted into the Association of American Universities (AAU), a group of the 60 most prestigious research universities in the U.S. and Canada in the next five years.

In introducing Bulger, Scott credited him for instilling a new sense of optimism in the University community.

"President Bulger has stepped into a difficult role and performed with all the daring and skills necessary," Scott said. "He has already brought a new sense of financial stability and intellectual renewal to the University, he has established a new scholarship fund and visited high schools across the state to encourage students to attend UMass, he has raised the admissions standards and he has helped to secure both matching funds from the State Legislature and a five year, $343 million capital program

Minuteman Battalion rappels Knightville Dam

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Correspondent

The Minuteman Battalion, comprised of Army ROTC students, held its annual rappel exercises at the Knightville Dam on Saturday.

Students were brought to the dam by a Chinook helicopter, a transport helicopter provided by the Connecticut National Guard. The helicopter picked up UMass students near the baseball field behind the Mullins Center, and after a 15 minute flight, maneuvering through the hills, landed in the valley next to the dam.

The helicopters first transported the students from Western New England College (WNEC), called Charlie Company. At 9 a.m. they picked up first–year ROTC students from UMass, known as Alpha Company. Second and third year students, Bravo Company, arrived at 12 p.m.

At the dam students received instructions for the rappel. They also saw a safety demonstration including a pumpkin– headed dummy dropped from ninety feet.

The students were required to rappel twice from a height of 30 feet, once from a height of 60 feet, and had the option to rappel from 90 feet. The students were supervised by Cadre, Army non–commissioned officers.

This field training exercise is one of the few times during the year that the battalion is gathered together in its entirety. The battalion is made up of three companies, one based at WNEC and the other two based at UMass, although there are students from all over western Massachusetts in the battalion.

"We have 150 cadets from 11 schools," said Lieutenant Colonel Kevin W. Kelly, battalion commander. Kelly called the event "adventure training," for "recruiting and retaining cadets... To show the more fun things that we do."

"One, it's confidence building; two, it's an adventure training type thing. They see some aviation and some infantry skills."

Captain Sean Higgins

According to Kelly, the program recognizes the importance of education.

"They're students first and not soldiers, academics come first," Kelly said.

The purpose of the exercise was to build confidence and have fun.

"We let them know what their own abilities and limitations are," Kelly said.

"One, it's confidence building; two, it's an adventure training type thing. They see some aviation and some infantry skills," said Captain Sean Higgins, who supervises the ROTC program at UMass.

"This year and most of next year is to get involved and have some fun," said cadet Matthew Goncalves, a freshman political science major.

Seniors in the ROTC program did not get to rappel, they were responsible for planning and operating the day's events.

"A lot of planning goes into something like this...You're really planning for 200 people," said Cadet Captain Matthew Bernard, a senior sociology

Israelis, Palestinians expected to resume talks soon

By Hilary Appelman
Associated Press

JERUSALEM — After six months of violence and recriminations, Israel and the Palestinians said yesterday they expect peace talks to resume soon following new signs of flexibility from both sides.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said the Palestinians had made "first, preliminary steps" toward fighting terrorism. He also ordered that $17 million in frozen tax revenues — about half what Israel owes the Palestinian Authority — be released. Israel cut off tax payments to the Palestinians after two suicide bombings in Jerusalem.

In another conciliatory gesture, Israel announced late yesterday that more workers from the West Bank and Gaza who had been barred from Israel would be permitted to enter Israel beginning Monday.

"The main thing is to make it clear to the other side that we want to go forward with the process, but that they must fight terror," Netanyahu told Israel Television. "There is a change in the past few days. I think that finally something has sunk in." Netanyahu said he expected an agreement on resuming talks to be reached today at a meeting in New York between Secretary of State Madeleine Albright, Israeli Foreign Minister David Levy, and Palestinian negotiamajor. He said that they have been planning this operation for "about a month."

"The seniors run this whole show," Higgins said. Kelly personally teaches a class to help seniors make the transition from cadet to lieutenant.

The cadets went through rigorous safety precautions, having their harnesses and equipment checked at several points throughout the exercise. "Safety is paramount," said Cadet Captain Raul Rovira, a senior Spanish and education major.

Most students enter the ROTC for the scholarships, and most of the students who apply for scholarships get them. Tim Lozeau is a freshman business management major, whose father is a colonel in the Army Reserves. He says that his father pushed him into joining the ROTC program. "I didn't really want to do it, but it turned out to be good," Lozeau said.

The students at Saturday's exercise enjoyed the experience. "It's a pretty good program, they do a good job here," said freshman cadet Brian Resnick.

"Once I joined it, I'm really happy that I did, I'm learning a lot," said cadet Kimberly Caron, a freshman apparel marketing major.

Cadet Tammy Sullivan is a sophomore environmental design major. "I've always been interested, and finally did it this year," she said. "It's an experience to be able to say you did it."

"You've got the mountains all around you, it's really beautiful... The ultimate foliage tour," Higgins said.

for new construction and renovations across the system."

In his principal address, Bulger reiterated his belief in the necessity of the study of the Humanities for achieving meaningful human life.

"Indeed, to all humans come quiet moments of agonizing introspection — they come to those searching for inner strength as well as those coping with the more obvious problems such as hunger or want," Bulger said. "The Humanities provide the ennobling grace essential to our lives... it is our education in the Humanities — the introspective study of ourselves, and that alone, that releases the serenity that sustains us."

The convocation concluded with the presentation of the Chancellor's Medal, the highest honor bestowed by UMass, to eight alumni, one from each college and school in the University.

Evan S. Dobelle, the president of Trinity College in Hartford, Conn. and a 1987 graduate, was honored for the School of Education.

Robert C. Wiesel, the chairman and chief executive officer of Stone & Webster Engineering Corp., Boston and a 1972 graduate, was honored for the School of Engineering.

Tso–Cheng Chang, owner of Amherst Chinese Foods and Chang Farms, Inc. and a 1973 graduate, was honored for the College of Food and Natural Resources.

Kathleen A. Cote, president and chief executive officer of Computervision and a 1971 graduate, was honored for the College of Humanities and Fine Arts.

Francis Guiliano, owner of Rite–Now Container Co. and a 1959 graduate, was honored for the School of Management.

David A. Tirrell, Barret Professor of Polymer Science and Engineering at UMass and a 1978 graduate, was honored for the College of Natural Sciences and Mathematics.

E. Ann Sheridan, assistant dean of the School of Nursing and a 1983 graduate, was honored by the School of Nursing.

Jerome E. Mileur, professor of political science and co– founder of the University's Jackie Robinson Initiative, was honored for the College of Social and Behavioral Sciences.

A reception in the Cape Cod Lounge followed the convocation.

Bulger speaks about his agenda

In a press conference held earlier in the day, Bulger said that one of his priorities was increasing the prestige of the University.

"I think this campus needs to be recognized more in its home state," Bulger said. "The substance is here. Beyond the borders, there is a greater appreciation of what we have. I think that message is getting out there."

Bulger said that the University should be competitive with the many private institutions in the state.

"It should be a first choice for people who have several choices," Bulger said. "I want people to know about it as a top flight institution."

He also spoke about the creation of a Commonwealth (honors) College on campus.

Bulger said that he is confident the State Legislature will financially support the construction of a Commonwealth College.

"Yes, they will. They have already indicated it," Bulger said. "It is just a question of what resources are available and what competitions there are for those resources."

In a final comment, Bulger addressed the new Guidelines for Student Protests on campus and said that the picket code was intended to ensure that students' studies would not be interrupted.

Bulger said that the code was not intended to suppress student expression, just to prevent disruption of University activities.

"We have a real respect for the right of people to express their opinions. The First Amendment is for everyone," Bulger said. "[But] there has to be a mature recognition that people who come here to study can do so."

UMass celebrates its diversity at Multicultural Food Festival

Selah Gabrielli, 15 months, from Amherst, sang to his soul's delight to the beat of Black Rebel band members during Saturday's Multicultural Festival on the Student Union Lawn.

A diversity of cultures came together for a celebration at the University of Massachusetts' Multicultural Food Festival on Friday.

"There's a lot of diverse groups coming together for one purpose," said William Sharpless in praise of the festival. "I'll walk away knowing that different cultures are still putting in an effort to come together as one and they still aren't giving up."

With booths presenting foods from the Pacific East, free ice cream from the University, poetry readings, music, dances and a slew of other events, there was a lot for the relatively small crowd to soak in.

However, according to John Feudo, Executive Director of Alumni Relations, the event was a definite success.

"The purpose of the day is to celebrate all of the great things about this campus, focusing on its diversity," Feudo said. "I think we need to see as many different things as we can to build community and this is one way of bringing people together."

Elijah Ruff, a freshman engineering major, said that this festival was a good way of bringing people together.

"As you can see, we have a lot of people talking and getting together to have a good time and communicate," Ruff said. "This is just the introduction."

"It will interest [students] to go on their own to research and learn about these cultures that are being presented here," said Judith Aquino, a senior legal studies and Spanish major.

This is the first year UMass has held this event, and while students believed it was generally a good idea, several said that there is definite room for improvement.

"It's a good idea, but it could be better," said Adam Popiel, a junior European studies major.

"I think that it's hard to promote cultural awareness by just focusing on the food and dance of other cultures," said Ali Anastasio, a former UMass student who attended the event. "While it's great to share the surface qualities of our heritage, there has to be a time when we sit down and really talk with each other to establish unity."

While it may have left some feeling that there should have been more, many agreed that this was definitely a good start.

"Something done tastefully is better than nothing at all," said Nica Chieri, a freshman, undeclared.

PRINCIPAL GUIDE TO RETIREMENT INVESTING

EXERCISE REGULARLY AND YOU COULD LIVE LONGER. INVEST REGULARLY SO YOU CAN AFFORD TO.

Americans are living longer than ever. So it's quite possible you'll spend 20 or 30 years or more in retirement. Can you afford it? Unless you're independently wealthy, chances are you'll need more than your pension and Social Security to support the kind of lifestyle you'll want.

How can you help ensure that you'll be in good financial shape? Sign up for TIAA-CREF SRAs — tax-deferred annuities available only to people in education and research.

SRAs are easy. No pain, no sweat.

The best way to build strength — physical or fiscal — is to start at a level that's comfortable and add to your regimen as you go along.

With TIAA-CREF SRAs, you conveniently contribute through your employer's payroll system. You can start with a modest amount and increase your contribution as your salary grows.

The important thing is to start now. Delaying for even a year or two can have a big impact on the amount of income you'll have when you retire.

Your contributions are made with pretax dollars, so you pay less tax now. Your earnings are also tax-deferred, so your money can accumulate faster than in a taxable account with the same rate of return. You'll pay taxes on your contributions and earnings only when you receive them as income. There may be some Internal Revenue Code limitations or tax penalties if you withdraw the money before you turn 59½.

SRAs offer you a range of income choices, including lifetime income, payments over a fixed period, or cash. If your employer's plan includes loans, you can borrow against your SRA to meet your other needs.

TIAA-CREF is the world's largest retirement system, managing approximately $200 billion in assets for more than 1.9 million people. We offer a wide range of SRA allocation choices, long-term investment expertise, and remarkably low expenses.

Multiculturalism, activism discussed during weekend

By Laura Barcella
Collegian Staff

On Saturday morning, as part of the Women Activists Reunion Conference, Beverly Guy–Sheftall gave a keynote address at Memorial Hall. A nationally known scholar and professor at Spellman and Emory Universities, Guy–Sheftall spoke about reinforcing the neglected connection between African–American and feminist studies.

Before an audience of about 75 people, Guy–Sheftall discussed and named many important black feminist achievers, both her contemporaries and predecessors.

"My mother was the first feminist I ever knew," Guy–Sheftall said. She said she admired her mother's acts of defiance, and in her mother's Memphis home "learning to be a homemaker was relatively unimportant... One could resist authority."

Guy–Sheftall led her audience through a history of black women in higher education, beginning with the first black woman admitted to college (Oberlin College). However, Guy–Sheftall wanted to "take us back hundreds of years, when enslaved African–American women taught themselves to read," and then held secret classes to teach one another.

"Courageous visionary women have never received the praise they deserved... [Their] work took place in the racial apartheid of the American South," she said. "These activists received ostracisation from their peers in Atlanta."

A major concern Guy–Sheftall expressed in her speech was the state of higher education today.

"The 'normal' human experience is Western, white, middle–class, heterosexual... It is no surprise that [students] feel unattached to the world of real human conditions," Guy– Sheftall said.

She said that students' apathy was a result of alienation because of institutionalized racism, sexism and classism.

Guy–Sheftall explored the many responsibilities of a modern professor. She asked, "Can we undo our own miseducation?" According to Guy–Sheftall, she tries to teach in ways that let students know who the real "thieves and villains" are. She said she always lets her students, who are mainly black women, know that her personal beliefs are not in accordance with society, and that one of her primary objectives is "to de–center Eurocentric male models... to disprove that whiteness and maleness are the most valuable commodities a human can possess."

Addressing the many activists and women's studies professors in the audience, Guy–Sheftall asked some questions about the state of women's studies today. "Has women's studies created a new canon... excluding other women? What should the relationship be between women's studies and multicultural studies?" Pointing out that there were no men in the audience, Guy Sheftall asked, "How do we attract more women of color and males to women's studies?"

Guy–Sheftall concluded her address with some final comments on what women activists and professors should strive to do.

She said, "We need to be as vigilant in opposition to racism and classism as we are to sexism... Don't let student activism die on the vine.

"Engage in the creation of a new world order, heed the words of Bell Hooks: we must first transform ourselves, armed with feminist and subversive strategies. We must take risks, be fast, be wild."

Northampton Mayor Mary Ford explained issues arising in today's society, such as tenant rights, on Saturday afternoon at Herter Hall.

By Sarah J. Kimmel
Collegian Staff

In conjunction with the celebration of 25 years of women's activism at the University of Massachusetts, Northampton mayor Mary Ford spoke on Saturday at a panel discussion entitled "Inside and Outside the Halls of Power".

Also speaking on the panel was State Representative Ellen Story, Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) Vice President Jennifer Fasulo, Andrea Fox from the Massachusetts Nurses Association, Michelle Gallagher from the Massachusetts Teachers Association, and Mary Sutherland who is a member of the Welfare Education Training Access Coalition.

The discussion was based upon the difference in the roles that are played between the legislators and bureaucrats and the activists. The panel briefly touched upon their own personal backgrounds and then moved onto a discussion of several issues such as housing, childcare and education.

Another common topic for debate was the proper way to be an activist. Debate persued on whether militancy was the correct course of action.

Story told about an incident where a militant group threw paper down onto the House of Representatives in order to make their point. "There is a difference between persistance and in your face," she said.

"I see myself more outside... as an activist," said Fasulo, a graduate student and protestor in the Goodell takeover last March. "Don't dismiss radical action all together. In–your– face tactics may piss people off but they work. This [rallying] isn't just an issue, we're dealing with people's lives."

Ford talked about her position as mayor in relation to activism. "Being in elective power is challenging to me. The reality is... I'm not a sell out. I pledged that I would encourage people to act on their own issues," said Ford.

The women on the panel encouraged their audience to educate and act on their issues regardless of their position either inside or outside the bureaucratic walls.

"I don't see this as an either–or, I see this as a team effort and I'm glad to be part of that team," said Gallagher.

Women's activism marks 25 years with gathering of programs' foremothers

By Dawn Pavao & Sarah Norris
Collegian Correspondents

In recognition of the 25th anniversary of Women's Activism at the University of Massachusetts, a panel of foremothers who were vital to the establishment of the three organizations for women on campus, met together on Friday at Memorial Hall.

This event gave alumni and students alike an opportunity to reminisce and discuss ideas with the women directly involved in making women's activism what it is today at the University.

The three vital organizations on campus — the Everywomen's Center, Women's Studies Program, and the Faculty Senate Council on the Status of Women — began with support groups created by these foremothers. These support groups in turn, led to the formation of the Amherst Women's Liberation, the Valley Women's Center and several other key organizations in women's activism in the valley.

With the theme being "Women of Vision in Action," the panel was asked to share some of their experiences with women's activism. They recalled times when their actions were not always considered legal, but they felt were important to the cause.

When the panelists were asked where they wanted to see the women's movement head in the future, they responded by reminding everyone there is still so much work to be done. One panelist, Lisa Baskin, said, "times are tougher now for women."

One of the foremothers, Louise Phillips, spoke about getting younger women involved in women's activism. She said that more universities should include women's studies classes in their curriculum. But before that happens, she said she would like to see women's issues taught in the high schools. Phillips said that she believes the Internet would be a viable means of communication for women's activism.

"The power is in the ideas," said panel member Kaymarion Raymond. "And it is with these ideas that such organizations like the one's being celebrated come into existence."

tor Mahmoud Abbas.

In New York, State Department spokesman James P. Rubin said Albright had been working hard in recent days to get Mideast peacemaking back on track.

"She hopes that as a result of recent contact between the United States and the parties, and discussions planned for tomorrow, we will be able to reestablish direct talks between the participants very soon," Rubin said in a statement yesterday. In Algiers, Algeria, Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat did not directly comment on Netanyahu's announcement, but called for an emergency Arab summit to discuss the latest developments.

But Arafat adviser Ahmed Tibi said he also expected the meeting to lead to a resumption of negotiations.

In recent days, the Palestinians have stepped up their crackdown on the militant Islamic group Hamas, which claimed responsibility for the bombings in July and September. Arafat's forces have rounded up dozens of suspected members and closed 16 Hamas institutions, including a kindergarten and a TV station.

A Palestinian Cabinet statement said Hamas had failed to respect agreements "to stop all acts of violence and terror."

Hamas, meanwhile, threatened new attacks against Israeli targets — and said for the first time that it was considering strikes outside Israel and the Palestinian territories.

Talks have been deadlocked since March, when the Palestinians broke off contacts to protest construction of a new Jewish neighborhood on disputed land in east Jerusalem. Israel put the talks on hold indefinitely after the first of the two suicide bombings.

Albright visited the region this month and urged both sides to get the talks started again. She asked Arafat to do more to rein in Islamic militants and Netanyahu to lift punitive sanctions on the Palestinians — including the withholding of badly needed tax money — and to temporarily halt expansion of Jewish settlements. She left without success, but did arrange a series of meetings in Washington that led to the announcement expected today.

Palestinians were furious and Albright sharply critical last week when Netanyahu announced he would continue building in the settlements, which the Palestinians see as precluding their hopes of establishing a state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. But while the move did nothing to improve the atmosphere of distrust between the two sides, Palestinian

Gas guzzling giants

Jason Davis

They are everywhere. Walk into the center of Amherst on a Friday afternoon and you will see what I mean. Remember to scurry across Pleasant Street quickly, and only during the brief, braying interval which marks the "walk" period, or you will risk angering those who sit anxiously in their hulking metal machines. If you bike (not on the sidewalks, of course) try to remain calm as you are repeatedly cut off by those who think only of moving, as fast as possible, to the red traffic light ahead. Better yet, head down to Route 9 on foot. There you will encounter vast acres of asphalt, laid down in expansive Middle America-style, all of it a testament and devotional to this marvelous creation.

I speak, of course, of the automobile. Many people casually refer to the present era as the "information age," a time when we have little need to physically go places. With all of sophisticated computer technology, we can conduct business, go shopping and socialize without ever leaving our homes, right? Well, I've got news for you. We are still in the thick of the unleaded age, with only marginal interest in embarking upon a transportation renaissance.

The popularity of the car has increased to the point that there are now about 15 new cars for every 20 people in the United States. The suburb and the mall, direct products of the automobile, have fed back upon themselves, creating a fragmented culture in which people have elevated the car to near religious importance.

At the same time, we seem to be remarkably unconcerned about the pollution that comes from our tailpipes. Nationwide, automobile emissions of carbon dioxide account for about 50 percent of all released greenhouse gases. In many cities, cars and trucks are the sole producers of ground-level ozone levels that can kill scores of people on a hot summer day.

Americans continue to produce ever greater numbers of large, gas-guzzling vehicles such as minivans and pickup trucks, a trend that helps to explain the roughly 150 billion gallons of gasoline we used in 1996. In fact, the No. 1 selling new vehicle in 1996 was the Ford F Series pickup, a behemoth that gets a miserable 17 miles to the gallon. And please don't let those slick ads where Pathfinders and Cherokees manfully conquer rugged mountain terrain and Amazon quicksand fool you. Everyone, from the CEO to the small-time car dealer, knows that the only people who buy these overpriced monstrosities are coddled executives and that the only terrain they ever see is the morning commute.

Speaking of commutes, take a look at those poor people who struggle every workday amongst their fellow brethren to drive from Amherst to Northampton, a distance of nine miles, in 45 minutes. Most of them sit uncomfortably alone with a mildly constipated expression on their faces, sealed off from the world around them by air-tight plate glass. I guess I can't really blame them though. A line of unmoving cars 10 miles long, all of which are belching out noxious fumes is pretty depressing.

The fact is that we should all have done away with those noxious fumes years ago. Engineers have developed cars that perform extraordinarily well and create almost no pollution by using super-efficient combustion and alternative fuel sources. There are today, automobiles that can get 75 miles to the gallon, cars that run on solar energy and buses that are powered by hydrogen derived from water. The list goes on.

Why can't we average car buyers find these vehicles? Contrary to popular belief, alternative-fuel automobiles are not "outperformed" by standard gas-powered cars. Instead, they are effectively kept off the market by the lobbying power of huge petroleum companies who are making a killing because most of us are forced to buy their product in mass quantities. The price of gasoline is also kept artificially low because of wasteful government subsidies and an archaic economic system, which claims that pollution is an "externality." All of this has led the average American to be blissfully addicted to their gas-guzzler.

To those of you who find yourself caught in this predicament, some advice. First off, you don't need your car as badly as you think you do. I know many students who actually drive from their dorm to the D.C. This is just silly. Most of us have legs, and most of us will not suffer unduly from walking up and down that big hill. Also, bicycles are a wonderful way to get around. In addition to giving you a free workout, they create no pollution and you don't have to park two miles from campus. If it is cold out, put on some warm clothes and you are set.

A word on buses. I dislike being pressed into a mass of drunken freshmen on Friday night as much as the rest of you. Hopefully, the PVTA will take a hint and have the express buses run more. Maybe we can even get them to stop using diesel fuel.

If we all just use our creativity and think about the future some, we do not have to give in to the tyranny of the automobile. There are solutions out there, but we have to stand up and take hold of them.

Red Cross just doing its job

To the Editor:

I was quite disturbed to see fliers posted on the campus telling students to protest against the Red Cross because they "discriminate against gay/bisexual men." The truth about the Red Cross is that they do not accept blood donations from any people in groups at high-risk of contracting the HIV virus. This group includes but is not exclusive to I.V. drug users, anyone who has received a blood transfusion, anyone who has accepted money for sex, people who live in or have had medical procedures in certain African countries with high populations of people infected with HIV, and any man who has had sex with a man or any woman who has sex with a man who has had sex with a man since 1975. But no one would say the Red Cross discriminates against drug users, prostitutes, women who sleep with bisexual men, or men who were raped.

The local chapters of the Red Cross must follow their own national set of guidelines when collecting blood donations which have nothing to do with discrimination. The Red Cross would surely like to collect blood donations from anyone willing to give. Unfortunately, their blood tests are not 100 percent accurate and they have a duty to supply the public with an uncontaminated supply of blood. In some cases HIV antibodies may be present in the blood but at levels so low even the most advanced tests would produce a negative test result. However, this blood would still be able to infect a recipient. What would you think if you, a relative, or a close friend were to contract AIDS from a tainted blood transfusion? You would probably be angry that the blood was not properly tested or the candidates not properly screened.

The only way The Red Cross can come close to ensuring an uncontaminated blood supply is not to accept donations from people in high-risk categories. Someone who has engaged in anal intercourse is considered to be at a high risk because the chance of blood to blood or semen to blood contact is much greater here than in vaginal intercourse, and condoms are not designed to withstand this activity. This means that if you are gay but have never had anal intercourse, you can still give blood. But by this token, women who have engaged in anal sex should also be placed in the high-risk category, not just gay men. Until the medical community decides that this is no longer considered to be high-risk behavior or until AIDS is cured, the Red Cross and all of its local chapters have no choice but to continue to not accept these donations.

Without a doubt, discrimination of any kind is intolerable. However, what we have here is not a case of discrimination. Even if it were, the answer would not be to boycott Red Cross blood drives. A good portion of blood donations collected in this country are from college blood drives, and a boycott would simply be keeping blood away from the hemophiliacs and accident victims whose lives depend on these donations. It is commendable that there are so many people in the gay community who would like to help the community by donating their blood, but it is deplorable to turn a medical issue of patient safety into an excuse to cry discrimination.

Inauguration coverage inadequate

To the Editor:

"New England's Largest College Daily" did not satisfactorily cover our President's Inauguration. The report did an excellent job of covering the speeches and who was there from the political scene, but failed to mention the students who were present. Musicians from UMass' Amherst campus were specifically selected to attend and perform on behalf of all the UMass campuses. There was no mention of our presence nor our performances. Each of the speakers thanked us (some more than once!) for sharing our talents, yet our own school paper did not even bother to do the same.

The 1970 President of the UMass Amherst Alumni Association wrote in to mention the musical talents shared — yet not a word from the Collegian. Even the photo essay was insulting. There was no picture of the students, of the guest speaker, the mayor of Boston, the Senate or House Representatives, nor a picture of the President's family. Instead there was a picture of the basketball coach. How ironic that President Bulger's entire campaign revolved around the Arts and Humanities which were not mentioned in the entire article/photo essay on the Inauguration.

What is the Collegian trying to say? That the Arts and Humanities are not important to the college student? That basketball is a higher priority than the students, musicians or David McCullogh? It is not for publicity that I am writing, but for representation! I do not feel that the Collegian represented itself well and I am greatly dissatisfied with my own college paper.

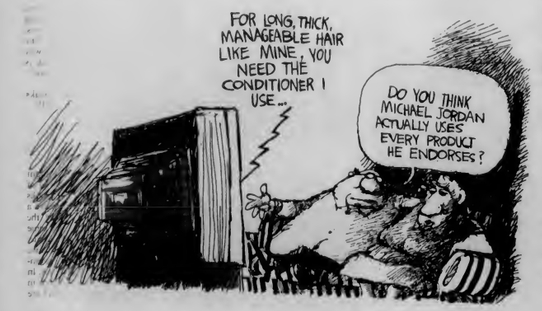
Explanations needed for ballot questions



To the Editor:

Could someone please tell me what SGA President Lia Wong's referendum questions meant and how are they helping the student body as a whole? I am extremely upset with the lack of information that the SGA gave out explaining their referendum questions. I believe that once again the SGA is trying to become the federal government and pass something through on behalf of the students, when the students are not fully aware what it is they are voting for.

I believe that both SGA President Wong and the Collegian are at fault for not being responsible in educating the student body about the referendum questions. There has been plenty of time since nominations for both Ms. Wong and the Collegian to take the time and give an unbiased explanation of the questions. What little coverage of the referendum questions the Collegian did have, did not explain what the referendum questions meant, only what they were.

It is my view that these questions should be discounted when the final numbers are in, how the students vote may not be how they wanted to. The SGA needs to understand that they are not career politicians and we should not be trying to push an issue on behalf of the students without the students being fully aware of the issues they are voting on. I say throw these questions away and put them on the spring election ballot, and in the interim take the time to educate the student body on what it is they are voting on.

Uncovering the persona of Sid

By Wendy Hernández
Collegian Correspondent

Much of the University of Massachusetts community, especially the African, Latino, Asian and Native American (ALANA) body, knows him, has laughed, shared social time and even cried with him. Sidonio Ferreira, better known as "Sid," has been at the University for nine years and has not only gained work and academic experience, but also the love of faculty members as well as students.

An ALANA UMass alumnus, Ferreira is now the first person of color to hold the Operations Manager position at the University Store, which he once visited as a struggling college student.

Ferreira was born in the island of Cape Verde and raised in Guine–Bissau until his family immigrated to New Bedford, where he graduated from high school. From there, he attended UMass, where he received his bachelor's degree in African–American Studies and stayed in the community in order to achieve one of his dreams. With his head tilted to the side and his eyes looking up at the ceiling, Ferreira reflected on why he decided to stay at the University.

"I stayed [here] because I always said I would give something back to my community. My community is UMass. My community is the Collegiate Committee for the Education of Blacks and other Minority Students (CCEBMS). My community is people of color. My community is Cape Verdeans," Ferreira said, and that is exactly what he did.

As a young college graduate, Ferreira immediately began giving back to his community when he took a temporary position at CCEBMS as an academic advisor. He then took an offer as a Case Worker/Counselor for the UMass– Amherst Upward Bound Program, in which he assisted high school students preparing for college by helping them develop study and time management skills, and walking them through the college application process. Ferreira found his work rewarding.

"Anytime you work with students is great. To see about over 90 percent of them going to college shows that the type of work you were doing was successful," Ferreira said.

Although Ferreira enjoyed doing this, he went back to his previous place of employment on a permanent basis when Floyd Martin, who had just become the director of CCEBMS and seen how he connected with students, invited him to apply for the position. After working for eight years with students at an academic level, five months ago Ferreira shifted to a managerial position at the University Store five months ago.

Did he also shift from his dream, his goal, his community?

As the Operations Manager for the University Store corporation, which includes the Textbook Annex, Print Shop, Games Room and Mini Store, some of Ferreira's many responsibilities are to make sure that the University Store opens, closes and has customers coming in, as well as overseeing the entire corporation.

"It's a great job because I'm still at the University campus. I still see a lot of you guys. I get to hire a lot of students, being of color or not," Ferreira said about his new position.

Managing the University Store, itself, is a contribution to the UMass community because it is a recyclable process. All the profit made from the University Store goes back to the Campus Activities Office to maintain the Campus Center. The opportunity was professionally beneficial and Ferreira took the chance because he was able to stay in the same institution and continue giving back to his community.

"I'm not leaving UMass because I love working with my students," he said.

Needless to say, the students surely love working with him. When Alain Montes, a Latino UMass psychology student, was asked if he knows Ferreira, his comical expression was, "Come on man, everybody knows Sid. Que pasa?"

Although Ferreira was not Montes' assigned CCEBMS advisor, he said that Ferreira took an interest in him and his academics. Ferreira helped him in choosing classes and even deciding on a major.

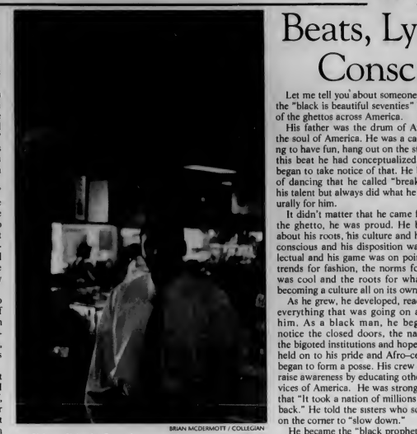
Montes described Ferreira as, "More than just my counselor. He has that familia touch. It's like you feel like you can tell him anything and he will help you out. That's the way I feel when I talk to him," said Montes.

Montes is all for Ferreira's managerial position and does not believe that it has not changed his concern towards his community.

"Although right now he's not a counselor, I still go to him and ask him questions about classes. He sees me around and he's always concerned about how I'm doing in school," explained Montes about Ferreira's character, with enthusiasm in his voice. "I would like to be like him [because] he has a special touch."

What is Sid's "special touch?" Ferreira has many philosophies that he lives by. "If you're positive, positive things will happen to you," and "To every problem there's a solution. It might take a long time to find the solution, but there is a solution. It's all about how you go about finding the solution. It's a very mathematical way of thinking," Ferreira said.

He is not invincible and has had to deal with many obstacles like many of the students he advises. He has been confronted with racism, has seen family members confronted with racism, but he refuses to let someone else's unhappiness destroy his joy.



"Not to say that I don't get upset at times. Yeah, those things happen but I try to be as positive as I can for myself, for my peers, for my students and for my co–workers because eventually that will influence to be positive," Ferreira explained.

Tenina Ramos, a Cape Verdean sophomore who was one of Ferreira's advisees and is now his employee, said that even though Ferreira is the boss now, he is still the same down–to–earth person she met a year ago.

"He is a role model. He is very into his nationality. He's everything. He's on top of things. He knows everything. He doesn't let anything go by him. Even though people throw obstacles in his way, he always finds a way to go around them," she said.

Montes and Ramos are just two of the students whose lives have been impacted by Ferreira. However, Ferreira was once in their shoes and followed someone's advice. He reminisced about a few words of wisdom said to him by Paul Barros, the former director of CCEBMS.

"You walk on this university like you own it," he said. "These same words he gives to the students struggling on this campus today."

In honor of our queen, Betty

Kenny Lacoste

In the course of the last three months, we as members of the Black diaspora, have been poisoned by the media to accept Princess Diana's death as the greatest loss or tragedy in recent memory; that the paparazzi and other media were cold–blooded in their analysis of her character, that she deserved the praise and respect that should be given to "royalty" and that her humanitarian efforts should be well recognized and appreciated.

If there is ever to be a conversation of a queen, or member of royalty, why not consider Dr. Betty Shabazz, who unfortunately was taken from us in early July? I cannot even begin to explain what this Black Queen, modern day Isis, meant to this community, a proud people of African heritage. The widow of powerful orator and activist Malcolm X, Sister Shabazz continued his aspirations for empowerment and civil rights that were loudly echoed in the decades of the 1950s and 1960s until her untimely passing.

She was a woman whom Malcolm X (El–Hajj Malik Shabazz) told author Alex Haley, prior to his autobiography, was "a good Muslim woman and wife." He continued by saying, "I don't imagine many other Black women might put up with the way I am. Awakening this brainwashed Black man and telling this arrogant, devilish white man the truth about himself, Betty understands, is a full time job."

But do we understand this job?

A job we must continue to perform, as people who are economically, socially, intellectually and politically oppressed, because of the endless ravines and weeds that are planted in our neighborhoods, communities, and ghettos.

Betty was the epitome of the strong black woman. A mother of six daughters (Attallah, Quibilah, Ilyasah, Gamila, Malikah and Malaak), as well as a graduate of Tuskegee, Jersey City State College and the University of Massachusetts School of Education (MA's). Shabazz attended this "prestigious" University for grad school).

A member of the Nation of Islam's Mosque No. 7 in Harlem, she met and later married Malcolm X in 1958. Betty was one of a number of influential black women during the Civil Rights Movement. Along with Coretta Scott King and Myrlie Evers, she helped to personify the large impact and leadership of black queens in the struggle for black independence.

Upon hearing of her death, I was in deep stress. I witnessed the poor media coverage, lack of respect and dishonest actions this country continually makes a custom of doing.

How can we just sit by and watch as the struggles of our ancestors go unappreciated, and bear witness to the legislative and social bull that continues to pour from the steps of the capitol building? When will we rightfully grab the torch and lead the masses into the 21st century and proceed with the revolution that has transpired over the last 400 years?

I am reminded of a quote, popularized during the Movement, said by an elderly lady who was involved in the Montgomery Bus Boycott.

"My feets is tired, but my soul is rested."

Indeed, Betty Shabazz is rested, for her feet were tired, but she never gave up the struggle. And if this is any indication, we shouldn't either.

THE HEART OF A WOMAN
Maya Angelou
Random House

Maya Angelou, author of the best selling I Know Why The Caged Bird Sings, Gather Together in My Name and Singin' and Swingin' and Gettin' Merry Like Christmas, enlightens readers once again in the fifth continuing autobiography of her life, encompassing her career as a singer, dancer, mother and author.

As The Heart of A Woman begins, we find a passionate Angelou about to embark upon the opportunity of a lifetime, the invitation to become a member of the Harlem Writers Guild. More than ready to leave her home in Los Angeles, Angelou packs her belongings as she and her teenage son, Guy, head for the Big Apple. Becoming a member of the Harlem Writers Guild was not as easy a task as headstrong Angelou had envisioned. She was quickly reminded by fellow guild members that her talent was not enough to carry her. She had to work. In the words of one of the members, "You must write every sentence over and over again, until it seems that you have used every combination possible and even then write it again."

While adjusting to the rigorous demands of the Writers Guild, Angelou worked the clubs, singing to support herself and her son, something she described as being a miserable experience. Singing was an experience she was ready to give up, when out of nowhere she received an offer to appear at the famous Apollo Theatre. This offer lead to many more singing engagements, which after months of burn–out she resolved never to return to again. Deciding to devote more time to her writing, she took on temporary, miscellaneous jobs to supplement her income.

Angelou's involvement with the Harlem Writers Guild lead to her involvement in the organization of a cabaret featuring the best musical and theatrical talent the city had ever seen. In addition to the cabaret, the Guild gave her the opportunity to make new friends, such as the divine Rosa Guy, whom Angelou described as being alike in boldness.

Through this friendship, Angelou and Rosa joined forces with others and became involved with Dr. Martin Luther King's history making quest. It was on this quest that Angelou promised her heart to one man, only to have it stolen, virtually on her wedding day, by Vus, a fiery African freedom fighter.

Vus was a man whom Angelou describes as seeing her as the flesh of his youthful dream; a man whom Angelou and her reluctant son follow to London, Cairo and Africa, while struggling to maintain their close mother and son relationship. It is in these lands that Angelou must constantly maintain her sense of self with the grace and dignity that she is so well known for.

The Heart of A Woman imparts lessons of a lifetime in courage, faith and love. In her unique, spell–binding way, Angelou re–creates intimate personal experiences, her fondest dreams and deepest disappointments. She shares her wisdom with us in the sincere, heartfelt way of a dear friend. The only problem with this book is that there wasn't nearly enough, as you want Angelou's story to never end.

Vulnerable, humorous, tough, Maya Angelou speaks with an intimate awareness of the heart within us all.

Beats, Lyrics & Conscious

Let me tell you about someone I'm in love with. Born in the "black is beautiful seventies" he was raised in the heart of the ghettos across America.

His father was the drum of Africa and his mother was the soul of America. He was a carefree child always wanting to have fun, hang out on the street corners and dance to this beat he had conceptualized. He was noticed and he began to take notice of that. He began to develop his style of dancing that he called "breaking." He underestimated his talent but always did what he loved, it came all too naturally for him.

It didn't matter that he came from the harsh realities of the ghetto, he was proud. He began to educate himself about his roots, his culture and his history. He was aware, conscious and his disposition was fly, his prose was intellectual and his game was on point. He set trends for fashion, the norms for what was cool and the roots for what was becoming a culture all on its own.

As he grew, he developed, reacting to everything that was going on around him. As a black man, he began to notice the closed doors, the nature of the bigoted institutions and hopelessness. He held on to his pride and Afro–centricity and began to form a posse. His crew now tried to raise awareness by educating others about the vices of America. He was strong and told me that "It took a nation of millions to hold them back." He told the sutters who sold themselves on the corner to "slow down."

He became the "black prophet," returning to his "jungle music," and used his verbal gymnastics as weapons to fight ignorance. He spoke about the queens and the kings of Africa and his support for the movements of Malcolm X, the Black Panthers and the Five Percent Nation. But as the harsh reality set in, he lost some of his crew to violence, and now he was angry.

He began to assume the position of vengeance and retaliation, not realizing the bigger picture. The game of the white man. He said he was "ready to die," that his was a "thug life." His greed and need to make money overshadowed his responsibility of conscious knowledge. He sold his soul to have mass appeal and in time he got it. But now, he was lonely. He felt a void in his life and searched for something to complete him.

He found me.

I brought to him consciousness, the intellectual stimulation and the poetic prose that he had lost. I opened his eyes to the lost art of freestyling. His breaking skills were revived. He began thinking globally and acting locally.

This man I love; he is still evolving and growing. He finds himself faced with many parallels and questions about his art, his politics, his integrity and his identity, but I am there right behind him, supporting, loving, nurturing and molding him to what he is.

Plight of a People: Contributions to our current problems

Edgar Barros

Last week we analyzed some of the factors which have contributed to the lack of economic prosperity among the African nations. This week we will cross the Atlantic, and discuss some of the factors which continue to economically hold black people down here in America.

I do realize that most of the people reading this article are not suffering, and may never suffer from economic depression. My attitude is that we should not forget about our brothers and sisters around the world who are. The stereotypes that were mentioned last week are not only used to describe black people in Africa, they are used to describe blacks in America as well. The social and cultural rape that was performed upon the Africans during the slave trade, has had an indirect but significant affect on the economic condition of Afro–Americans today. Blacks were torn apart from their families, stripped of their name, stripped of their dignity, stripped of their history and religion, as well as their humanity. When you trace everything back, this is essentially where the problem began. Blacks were branded like cattle, the females (young and old) were raped in front of their husbands and/or parents, and many were used as sex slaves. Blacks were hung upside down and beaten. Families were broken up. The reason? It was a process of "domestication."

What does this have to do with today — 1997?

I'll tell you. The children of slaves were born into slavery and taught by their owners to hate themselves, their families, their past and their future. Their goal in life was to be an obedient slave who could escape the whip of his/her master. Today, in modern society, many blacks still grow up with a sense of failure. When blacks were freed, they were not given much to live on. They were promised 40 acres and a mule, but received 40 lynchings and a mallet upside their head. Therefore, generation after generation of African–Americans grew up with this feeling of presumed failure. This negative feeling seriously hampers the prospect of a bright future, whether it be economically or socially.

Many black children in America do not know their own history, except the fact that they were slaves, and that Martin Luther King, Jr. was hosed down by fire fighters so we can drink out of the same fountains as white people. Today, the rape that black people suffer is less explicit, but nonetheless real. Instead of the whip, the branding iron, or the shackles, the primary tool being used is education. I'll skip over the fact that many inner city schools, where the majority of the students are students of color, are grossly under–funded, I won't mention that.

What I will mention though, is the lack of black history in the school's curriculum. Black children, including myself, are taught a great deal about the great discovery of Christopher Columbus (one of the most notorious criminals in history), and are encouraged to feel the pride and happiness associated with Columbus. We are taught to immortalize such individuals such as George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, Alexander Hamilton and various other "forefathers."

Don't you think black students should know that the discovery of America was actually the discovery of hell on earth for millions of Africans and Native Americans? America needs more black history in its school curriculum. Shouldn't black students know about the great empires in ancient Africa, such as Mali, Benin and Zimbabwe? Shouldn't black students be taught that many of the Egyptian pharaohs were black men? Shouldn't black students know that the great authors of the Constitution and Declaration of Independence were also wealthy slave owners? Shouldn't black students know that the Constitution was not written with them in mind? Shouldn't black students know who "rewrote" the Constitution so that today (for the most part) it may be applied to all people, regardless of the color or ethnic background? You should have answered "yes" to every one of the above questions.

People such as Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., Malcolm X, Marcus Garvey, the Black Panthers, the Blood Brothers, Kwame Ture (Stokely Carmichael), Harriet Tubman, John Parker, Medgar Evers, Frederick Douglas and many others whom I can't name due to my lack of education, are people who should be more involved in our school's curriculum. Barbara Jordan eloquently stated, "I felt somehow for many years that George Washington and Alexander Hamilton just left me out by mistake. But through the process of amendment, interpretation, and court decisions, I have finally been included in 'We the people.'" So, as black children go through school they develop the sort of feeling that they don't belong; a sense that they are not represented in the glories of history. Believing that their people have never succeeded in anything besides running around Africa buck naked, many black students grow a sense of failure and alienation. In many cases, this may translate into lack of pride. There is a famous quotation that says, "You have to know where you came from in order for you to know where you are today, and you must know where you are today in order to know where you are going tomorrow." Grade schools, middle schools, and high schools in America have to start telling black students where they came from so that black people may stop hobbling around and start running towards tomorrow. America has to stop cheating our people. Malcolm X once said, "Education is our passport to the future." Well damn it, they're denying us our passport!

How does all this tie into the economic condition of blacks in America? When you have a people who lack the education and positive sense of oneself needed to succeed in this society, many will have little choice but to resort to another way of life. What do I mean by "little choice?" When you live in a place where a lot of economically challenged people from different walks of life are thrown on top of each other in housing projects, life can be tough. When you live in a place where the best jobs available pay minimum wage, you might have to resort to another source of income. When your school textbooks are from the early eighties, you have a liquor store at every other corner, the police harass you everyday for the same lame excuses, and marijuana, cocaine, heroin, crack, etc., are pumped into your neighborhood daily by the government, life can leave you little choices. In other words, many black children in America are born into poverty and are not offered many ways out.

All of these factors, plus the prejudices and discrimination that blacks put up with everyday, all contribute to the current economic plight of African–Americans. Therefore, let us not be fooled. Not all Americans are given an equal chance to succeed. Everyone does not have equal access to good jobs and education. The institution of physical slavery lasted for about 500 years, the damaging effects cannot be completely remedied in 135 years (1862–1997). The government has to recognize that the system, not black people, is the main problem. Despite all the stereotypes and beliefs, black people as a whole, did not put themselves into the situation they are currently in. We received a lot of help from outside forces (to put it lightly).

MULTIBAND POPS
Fine Arts Center Concert Hall
Sept. 26

The twenty-third annual Multiband Pops concert took the stage at the Fine Arts Center Concert Hall Friday night to a packed house and thunderous applause.

The Multiband Pops is a production of the University of Massachusetts Department of Music and Dance. Every year, the concert showcases the talents of students in the department in music, dance and vocal jazz.

The concert opened with a fanfare from Walter M. Chesnut, the University Herald Trumpeter.

The University Orchestra, conducted by Mark Russell Smith, played "Chester" from New England Triptych, composed by William Schuman. The Schuman piece flowed soothingly, as the chirping sounds of the piccolo floated above the music.

In direct contrast to the gentle melody of the Schuman piece, the Chapel Jazz Ensemble followed up with Cole Porter's "Love for Sale," an energetic piece highlighted by solos by Matt Sexauer and Brian Kearsley.

The Wind Ensemble, under the baton of Malcolm W. Rowell, Jr., performed "I'm Seventeen Come Sunday." Following the Wind Ensemble, the UMass Marimbas performed the "Intermezzo" from Cavalleria Rusticana, a piece by Pietro Mascagni. Under the direction of Peter H. Tanner, the music sounded sweet, yet haunting.

The Vocal Jazz and African–American Music Ensemble performed two pieces. The first piece, "Leaning on the Everlasting Arms," was arranged by ensemble director, Horace Clarence Boyer. "Crystal Silence" was the second selection.

The rich fullness of the Brass Choir on "Chorale for Brass and Percussion" by Vaclav Nelhybel, was followed by the delightful cacophony of the Percussion Ensemble on "Oguon Badagris" — a piece by Christopher Rouse.

In a burst of red, the University Dancers took the stage with "No Time Like the Present." With music by Pat Metheny and choreography by Billbob Brown, the dancers' energy flowed neatly from movement to movement.

The first part of the show tied up with the Jazz Ensemble I on "Esprit" and the Symphony Band on John Barnes Chance's "Blue Lake Overture."

After the intermission, Minuteman Marching Band director George Parks was presented with an award for his 20 years with the band.

President William Bulger then spoke to the audience. First, he thanked members of several performing groups who played at Fanueil Hall and Symphony Hall on Sept. 18. He also praised the Multibands' musicians, saying "[Multibands] was a professional performance."

The Minuteman Marching band then came on to show why they are considered "The Power and Class of New England," with rousing selections from Tommy.

This year's Multibands was exceptionally well–done. The transitions were smooth, noiseless and organized. It was a wonderful night of music.

Bern brings down Iron Horse

DAN BERN
Iron Horse
Sept. 25

NORTHAMPTON — Dan Bern cruised into the Iron Horse Thursday night and electrified the crowd with his brand of folk/blues/punk/rock. Touring with a band for the first time, the usually solo and acoustic Bern made good songs even better with the addition of the fine musicians backing him up.

Bern started with "Tiger Woods," one of many crowd favorites that do not appear on his debut album. Bern toys with the idea of male sexuality, and the need to always be "bigger" than those around you, building a chorus from Muhammad Ali's famous phrase "It ain't braggin' if it's true." The song ended in thunderous applause which seemed to genuinely catch Bern offguard. "I don't know where you guys came from," he told the crowd, "but I hope you stick around."

Bern then played a newer song, "Charles Manson's Real Name," in which Bern makes the observation that maybe Manson wouldn't have been able to convince young ladies to do his bidding if they knew his real last name was in fact Krautmeier. The song says that maybe if he had kept the name Krautmeier, current artist Marilyn Manson might not have adopted the name for himself and conversely would be able to play more concerts. "You think they'd try to ban a Marilyn Krautmeier? I kind of doubt it," sang Bern.

One of the amazing things about Bern is every song he plays, whether it's been heard a hundred times (such as the crowd favorite "Jerusalem") or almost never (he writes a song a day, thus giving him a large arsenal of songs to choose from), every song is good, and ignites a crowd.

"True Revolutionaries," another more recent song, kept the crowd bobbing their heads and tapping their feet despite it's 10–minutes–plus length. In the song, Bern condemns those who try to change the world through violence ("True revolutionaries don't bomb buildings / it attracts too much attention," he sings), and also those who claim to be revolutionary when in fact they just "Get coffee to go from Starbucks / and read 'Steal This Book.'"

Though it could be said the whole show was a highlight, standout moments included Bern's singing of "Marilyn," arguably his most popular song, which asks what would have happened if Marilyn Monroe had married Tropic of Cancer author Henry Miller (known for a lifestyle that makes Marv Albert look like Mr. Rogers) instead of Death of a Salesman author Arthur Miller. Bern sings, "If she did, she'd have dyed her hair blue / if she did, she'd have felt like a woman / not like a photograph in a magazine."

After a regular set with his band, Bern returned to the stage by himself to perform two more songs, both in the "talkin' blues" style invented early in the century, but made popular by Bob Dylan in the 60s. The first was a tribute to friend and colleague Ani Difranco (whose guitar Bern played throughout the show). Bern tells the story of how he made a journey to Buffalo to meet DiFranco, and, finding her not home, stayed with her mom for nine months.

Merrie Amsterburg opened for Dan Bern at the Iron Horse on Thursday.

The second paid tribute (and poked fun at) the artists Bern is most often compared to. In "Talkin' Bob and Woody and Bruce and Dan Blues," Bern tells the story of how Bob Dylan went to see Woody Guthrie on his death bed, and Woody handed the job of "moving the masses" to Dylan (a true story). Bern then tells the story of how he broke into Bruce Springsteen's house and tried to convince Bruce he was dying, so the Boss would do the same for him (probably not a true story, but with Bern, it's hard to tell). It was a very amusing way for Bern to tell the story that, though he appreciates the comparisons, he'd rather be the first Dan Bern instead of the "next Dylan or Springsteen."

Opener Merrie Amsterburg, known to Boston–area music fans as the lead singer of the '80s band Natives, provided a solid opening set, utilizing a mandolin and three different guitars for her Aimee Mann–esque set, but she couldn't hold a candle to Bern's performance. For that matter, there aren't many emerging artists around who can.

"All My Children"

The head honchos at ABC Daytime have once again left me in a state of bewilderment. Late last week the network announced that "All My Children" is letting go of Carrie Genzel, who has been nothing short of exceptional in her portrayal of the complicated Skye Chandler. Of all the people to get the boot from "AMC," why was Skye the first to go? I can think of a dozen or so characters who are more worthy of such a departure, characters who have been on the backburner so long they have become about as interesting as wallpaper. I thought her character, as despised as she may be by some factions, had become quite the intriguing enigma.

It's complicated characters like her, Janet, Kelsey and Erica who have kept my interest throughout the years, characters who can commit the most heinous of sins and yet still garner some sympathy from the fans (which is no easy task, I assure you). If the writers find themselves unable to write a storyline for someone with as much potential as Skye, than perhaps the problem lies with the writers' lack of imagination and not with the actors and characters themselves. I've always felt this way when it comes to the needless firing of popular actors. It's hard enough to hold on to the few we have left in the industry; let's not add to the problem by giving potential stars the boot before they've even had the chance to shine. What a waste!

"Another World"

Lila got an earful from Shane last week after her lies were exposed (the "Dear Jane" letter to Vicky that she forged). The scene was hard for me to swallow because I've been pulling for a Lila/Shane reconciliation. The idea of him with Vicky doesn't appeal to me at all. Lila and Shane, however, sizzle every time they're in a scene together.

As much as I would like to be terrorized by the whole Rayburn situation (in case you don't know, Rayburn has Toni and Josie trapped in the cabin), it's not working. I liked the idea of Toni and Josie teaming up to give Rayburn a taste of justice — Thelma and Louise style — but Rayburn's character has proven to be little more than a joke. As I watched last Thursday's scenes, my friend Bridget and I couldn't help but laugh at the campy absurdity of it all. Speaking of campy...

"Days of Our Lives"

Anyone who wasn't watching "Days" last Wednesday and Thursday, during Ivan, Vivian and Susan's seance missed out on a hilarious few episodes. I can't tell you what a treat it was to laugh like that after the tragedy of Sonny and Brenda on "General Hospital" (which I will get into a bit later). Watching them make contact with the supposed spirit of Elvis (Vivian in drag) was a sight to be seen. If "Days" is never good for anything else, at least it's always good for a laugh.

I enjoyed the little confrontation between Kate and Laura. Meow, those two were vicious. I'd love to see Kate wipe the floor with that annoying twit, Laura.

One more thing, please stop with the Sami ordeal. Enough is enough! I'd rather be locked away in one of Stefano's cages than to have to sit through another day of the never ending quest for Austin. Find the witch another obsession to toy with.

In a bit of news, Mark Valley's last airdate as Jack was Sept. 26.

"Sunset Beach"

There's good news on the "Sunset Beach" front. Finola Hughes (ex–Anna Scorpio on "GH") has joined the show. That's quite a coup for a show whose cast has been lacking as of late. I challenge you to find more than three actors on that show who have some real depth (I'm talking Maurice Benard, Sonny on "GH" depth). That's one of the reason's why I stopped watching the show shortly after its premiere. The cast just seemed like a bunch of beautiful cardboard cutouts who were in real need of an acting coach. Ouch, that was a bit harsh.

In the show's defense though, there're a few actors who have really shown some growth over the past year and the show itself has made some great strides. I've actually found myself interested in the show on a few occasions. The fact that Finola is joining the cast may only serve to sweeten the deal.

Word is the show has put out a casting call for Ben's presumed dead wife, Maria. Rumors have it that Lily Melgar (ex–Lily on "GH") and Crystal Chappell (Maggie on "One Life To Live") are being considered for the role.

"One Life To Live"

Is anyone else enjoying the rivalry between Kelly and Blair over the affections of Llanview's British stud, Ian Armitage? I'm so glad to see Blair in the swing of things again. For a while there I was afraid she might have lost her catty and vindictive edge (a must for the quintessential soap opera diva).

Gabrielle's name has been thrown around an awful lot lately which leads me to wonder whether or not she might make a return visit to Llanview in the coming year. Rumors have been circulating about a hush–hush casting call for the role since the actress who originated the part, Fiona Hutchinson, is contractually bound to another soap, "Guiding Light."

"General Hospital"

In what was by far the tragedy of last week, Sonny left Brenda standing at the altar. It almost seemed like an injustice to those of us who have followed the couple's torrid affair throughout the years. Although the scenario wasn't as preposterous as that of Lois leaving Ned, it was slightly disappointing nonetheless.

Watching her fall to pieces with no one but the surprisingly insensitive Jason to console her almost broke my heart. Maurice Benard's (Sonny) last scene with Jason was touching although his last words to Brenda — "It was a great ride" — left a lot to be desired and was completely out of character. Don't worry though, Brenda isn't taking this lying down. She's spitting fire.

Some quick side notes: Catherine — nice right hook! It might be wise to save one for your pal, Alexis, too. Things to come this week: Look for Monica to come after Carly like a bat out of hell when she discovers her involvement in A.J.'s "slip."

Basinger makes stir in L.A. Confidential

By Douglas J. Rowe
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Kim Basinger says it all escalated into a "fire ball" — her refusal of a role, the resulting lawsuit, the subsequent settlement, her bankruptcy, even the dashed plans of developing a small Georgia town she bought.

"None of it made any sense and it was all so misrepresented," she says. "And the sad part about it is that nothing good became of it."

Now she likes to think it's all behind her. "Old noise," she calls it. Drowning that out is a new buzz — about her new movie L.A. Confidential and about her performance as a Veronica Lake look–alike hotsker (high–priced and with a heart of gold, of course). Both have gotten raves. Curtis Hanson, director and co–screenwriter of the film set in 1950s Los Angeles, says one reason the 45–year–old actress got cast in the role was "She's one of the few contemporary actresses that you imagine in a George Hurrell photograph — as glamorous as any star in the old studio system."

Basinger said she was drawn to the physical challenge of becoming Veronica Lake, "who was unfortunately more well–known for her hairdo (the long blond hair coming down over one eye) than for her ability."

"I really wanted to capture her," Basinger said.

Yet, what she was trying to captured remains elusive in Basinger's mind. "It's something many actresses had back then... When they had it, they had it. This kind of glint. It was something in their eyes, something in their intonation... They always caught you off guard."

But what is "it"?

"It's kind of a just a comfortable–with–yourselfness on the screen. You know what I'm saying? Rather than always having to be a character. I think she was a character. And I think she brought Veronica Lake to everything she played. And I think she's more interesting than every character she ever played."

Which begs the question: Does this apply to herself? Say, is there a Kim Basinger–ness that she brings to her latest role? Initially stumped, she settles on compassion and humor.

"To me, humor is intelligence. Humor is so important in your life. It's so important. And it's so important to know that you can always fall back on it, even when things are just going in the most spiraling downhill," she says, laughing and moving her arm in a downward spiral.

In that case, life must have been hysterical for a while, starting in May 1991. That's when she decided to pass on the title role in Boxing Helena, a Jennifer Lynch film about a woman whose arms and legs are cut off by a doctor obsessed by her. The film's producers sued her for breach of oral contract, and she lost. The $8.1 million jury award forced the actress into bankruptcy, and she subsequently settled with the producers of Boxing Helena for $3.8 million.

Amid the legal wrangle and uncertain finances, her grand plans for the town she bought with a group of investors in 1989 also got scuttled.

Braselton, Ga. — about 10 miles from Basinger's hometown Athens — was put on the map by the purchase and the talk of renovating the turn–of–the–century stores and houses, building a movie studio and luring other industry to the town. But by 1995, Basinger and her investment partners were selling off parts of the town.

UMass survives late charge, hold off 'Stangs

SMU	1

FARMERS BRANCH, Texas — Everyone is concerned with the price of living. From an elderly person to a normal college student, one of the main concerns in life is how you are going to get through the day, week, month and year with your head above water.

Friday night at Cox Field, 30 minutes north of Dallas, the No. 10 Massachusetts women's soccer team had to worry about the price of surviving against No. 13 Southern Methodist. The Minutewomen (7–1) did pick up a 2–1 win over the Mustangs (6–3), but not without paying a heavy price.

SMU is known for its tough physical presence, and that is what UMass prepared for and expected coming into the match. But dealing with nicks and dents before and during the match, ranging from sore knees and ankles (sophomore midfielder Cindy Garceau and junior midfielder Robin Smith respectively) to calf injuries (junior forward Sophie Lecot and freshman midfielder Brooke Bartlett) to shin splints (freshman midfielder Molly McGrew), the Minutewomen had to come out more than tough.

With an incredible comeback in the second half, when the Mustangs mustered up eight corner kicks and 13 shots on the UMass net, SMU was still not able to even the 2–0 Massachusetts lead.

So in the end the Minutewomen held on for the win, and UMass coach Jim Rudy had to thank one–quarter of his senior leadership, tri–captain Erica Iverson, for bringing the road win home.

Iverson's goal in the 53rd minute iced the win for the sore UMass squad, set up by the hard run by freshman forward Kara Green on the right half of the penalty area. On the ensuing indirect kick sophomore midfielder Tarah Tokarchik nicely placed the kick on the far post, and Iverson headed in the eventual game–winner for UMass.

"We played really well in the first 55–60 minutes, and we took care of the SMU forwards," Rudy said. "But after that they really got dangerous, and we lost a few players so we had to rearrange our lineup. But it was great to see Erica come through for us once again, she has a real knack for getting that kind of goal for us."

At one point, Rudy had to put his sophomore front runner Kate Webb on the back line, after he had to substitute Garceau out after she turned her knee. Due to SMU senior midfielder Marci Miller's knack for winning headers, Rudy had to put his leading scorer, Lecot, in the midfield to help Smith neutralize Miller.

The scoring started in the 21st minute of the match for UMass, as the duo of Lecot and sophomore forward Emma Kurowski combined to make the hardest of efforts look easy. Kurowski battled down the right flank with a defender draped all over her while getting a low shot off on junior goalkeeper Erin Poole. Poole made the initial save, but the ball trickled out in front of the open net, and Lecot tapped in the first goal of the game and her seventh of the season.

SMU took over the game in the second half, but not before Iverson headed her teammates in the winning direction.

The difference for the Minutewomen was they took care of their scoring opportunities, while the Mustangs had keeper Danielle Dion to deal with. Dion made nine saves in the second frame, with the only blemish coming against Miller in the 76th minute.

Miller blasted a shot from 20–yards out, and the ball hooked past Dion's outstretched right glove into the top corner of the net. After continuing pressure on the UMass net, the Mustangs were not able to score the equalizer, and the Minutewomen came out with a win over nationally ranked opponent.

creates a kind of roundhouse swing."

Shea said, "So we moved her palm to the top and had the other fingers form a V down the shaft, creating a pendulum motion that isn't as inconsistent."

Johnston's goal forced overtime, a six–on–six sudden death period, and set the stage for Lyons' heroics.

"This game gives [UMass] a lot of confidence," Shea said. "They've played in an overtime game before and lost, and they didn't want to feel that again."

The confidence from this game came at an opportune time. On Saturday, the Minutewomen will face defending national champion North Carolina on the Tar Heels' home field.

"This game gets us back in our groove," Lyons said. "Now we are moving full–force."

"This is a great game to have before going to UNC," Johnston said. "We can only rise from here."

Kerry Lyons

Glass slipper fits Lyons; former walk–on is the hero

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

In one moment, Kerry Lyons went from a role player to a hero.

Less than seven minutes into sudden death overtime, Lyons pushed home the game–winning goal as the Massachusetts field hockey team defeated Temple, 2–1, at Richard F. Garber Field.

After Laura Phelan advanced the ball to within close range of the Owl cage, Lyons controlled the ball and went straight for the net. Temple goalie Deb Brown was able to get her foot on the ball, but not enough to redirect the shot.

"I saw the ball coming and I went for everything," Lyons said. "Laura passed it in, I think someone else may have touched it, and I wanted to put it on net.

"I just spun around and hit it."

In her moment of glory she thought of her team.

"All I wanted was to hit it in for the team," she said. "I didn't care about getting a goal for myself."

And her teammates thanked her appropriately.

"After I scored they all kissed me, hugged me and congratulated me. They were saying 'I love you. I love you.'"

Not just a game winner, but the goal was also the first of Lyons' collegiate career.

"I needed that one to prove to myself that I belong here," she said.

It's a good thing for Massachusetts she was there. Overtime in field hockey follows a six–on–six format in order to spread out the field and allow for more ball movement. If fans in the crowd were a bit surprised to see Lyons on the field instead of a more battle–tested veteran, her teammates provided the balance.

"She deserved to be out there and she proved it," junior forward Erica Johnston said. "She's been playing really well lately and I have complete confidence in her as a player. I wasn't surprised that she was out there at all."

UMass coach Patty Shea, who made the decision knew Lyons' combination of her skills and speed would benefit the Minutewomen.

"Kerry is real dangerous up around the goal," Shea said. "She's persistent, she's got good speed, she doesn't give up and that's important in overtime.

The journey from bench warmer to game winner has been a long one for Lyons, who made the Minutewomen squad as a walk–on her freshman year. The Norwood native decided on UMass, instead of any of the several schools that recruited her, but a scholarship was not available. She wanted to play anyway.

"She's a great story," Shea said. "She's playing for the love of the game. That says a lot about her character and the character of all the walk–ons."

After joining the team, Lyons didn't have the smoothest start to her collegiate field hockey career. It wasn't until the 14th game of her freshman year that she even had a uniform, much less playing time. That year her on–field minutes were sporadic, and she never had the chance to showcase the skills that earned her league all–star recognition in high school.

In her sophomore campaign, Lyons was given more opportunity. She saw time in 14 games — starting one — and she responded with one assist. Still, she could not demonstrate her true abilities.

This year, she has been given that chance. A regular substitute and sometime starter, Lyons has finally silenced any of her critics.

She could not have found a better time to do it.

through huge holes created by the Massachusetts line. Pizano got the call 10 times for 49 yards. Coincidentally, Pizano enjoyed a 96–yard touchdown run last year at Rhode Island, the longest gallop in UMass history.

The highlight of the ground attack perhaps came from sophomore fullback Dan Healey. Getting the ball most often in short–yardage situations, Healey made the most of his opportunity, bulling his way for 51 yards on 15 carries.

But it was UMass' passing attack that put two scores on the board.

The second drive of the game for the Minutemen culminated in a five–yard touchdown toss from sophomore quarterback Jeff Smith to junior tight end Kerry Taylor. The drive was lengthened on a critical third–down and long conversion to junior wide receiver Doug Clark. Clark made an acrobatic grab 27–yards up the field after Smith was flushed out of the pocket and heaved an awkward–looking ball.

Two minutes into the fourth quarter, Smith found Taylor again in the back of the end zone. The four–yard touchdown pass put UMass up for good, 18–14. The drive was highlighted by a 16–yard slant and a 15–yard reverse to Clark.

Smith completed 11–of–24 passes for 105 yards and two touchdowns for the day.

The Massachusetts defense applied pressure on the Rams offense all afternoon.

Much–heralded Kentucky–transfer quarterback Billy Jack Haskins was knocked out of the game with a dislocated right shoulder late in the first quarter.

The backup quarterback, sophomore Rudy Bulgar, exited the game soon after with a sprained ankle. This put the pressure on junior quarterback Jeff Weaver who didn't fare well under the Minutemen pass rush. Weaver was dropped twice by senior defensive lineman Mike Batelli and sophomore strong safety Jerard White.

"We made some big plays. Defensively, we felt we had things under control," Hodges said.

Once the passing game was shut down, Rhode Island turned to their leader, junior running back James Jenkins. Jenkins kept the Rams in the game, rushing for 128 yards on 29 carries and a touchdown.

The Minuteman offense responded to the Jenkins threat, keeping him off the field as long as they could while dominating the time of possession with long drives.

Still, in the waning seconds of the game, Rhode Island had the ball with a chance to win the game. But when junior tri– captain Khari Samuel deflected a Weaver pass into the air, Batelli jumped to secure the ball and the victory with the interception.

"I was able to release from my guy, I followed him (Weaver), jumped and got lucky," Samuel said.

But when the outcome had been decided, UMass credited the turnover ratio for the win. The Minutemen took away the ball four times — two fumble recoveries and two interceptions — to the Rams' none.

"These were the things we had to work on, and we did," Hodges said. "We had opportunities and we took advantage of them."

"We tried to raise the tempo and it worked for us," Samuel said. "I'm really proud of how everyone reacted."

The Minutemen pulled off their sixth consecutive Homecoming game victory in as many years, while Hodges found some humor in the streak.

"I've declared next week Homecoming game No. 2," he said.

Next week UMass hopes for a repeat performance when it hosts the New Hampshire Wildcats in Atlantic 10 conference action. Game time is scheduled for noon at McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

time to learn a lot of things."

Mooney attributes much of his success to the new defensive set instilled by defensive coordinator Jerry Azzinaro. Under Azzinaro's leadership, the team's weekly practice schedule consists of watching films on Sundays, Mondays off, followed by two days of intense practices on Tuesday and Wednesday. By Thursday, the game plan is set.

"He's a great motivator," Mooney said. "He's made our practice tempo faster than the actual game, so once Saturday comes around, it's almost like its slow motion."

Minutemen Notes: UMass coach Mike Hodges improves his Homecoming record to a perfect 6–0... Marcel Shipp led UMass with 82 yards rushing on 22 carries. He's averaging 5.3 yards per carry over the last three games... Dan Healey, who replaced the injured Jamie Holston at fullback, ran for 51 yards on 15 carries, including one 14–yard pick–up through the middle of the Rams defense... Khari Samuel led the defense with 10 tackles. His biggest play of the game came when UMass was leading 18–14 with under a minute to go in the game. He broke in through the offensive line and swatted a pass from Weaver which Mike Batelli intercepted. That play iced the victory for the Minutemen... Doug Clark had the catch of the day. Under pressure, Jeff Smith sent the ball deep into URI's territory. Clark blew past his coverman and dove after the ball. It was a 27–yard reception, the longest of the day. Clark caught 4 passes for 70 yards.

UMass ends losing streak, squeaks by URI 18–14

By Corey Peter Goodman
Collegian Staff

Sitting in the post-game press conference in front of the local media — the same people who have bashed his team and its effort over the first three weeks of the season — Massachusetts football coach Mike Hodges finally had something to smile about.

"The effort was just fantastic," Hodges said.

Minutes before, his Minutemen earned their first victory of the season with a Homecoming day drumming of the Rhode Island Rams, 18–14, before 8,218 faithful fans at Warren P. McGuirk Alumni Stadium Saturday. When the dust had settled, Hodges felt a huge load lifted off his team's back.

"There have been some hard comments made here the last few weeks, and it's been hard for them to focus," he said. "I'm just relieved and happy for our kids."

While rowdy alumni and students alike were coming together in the stadium parking lot yesterday afternoon to celebrate with hot dogs and beer, UMass was patiently working on its most complete effort of the season.

This was anchored, ironically, by the Minuteman offensive line that appears to be coming into their own. The front five gave up just one sack and paved the way for a UMass rushing attack that tore up the Rams defense for 189 yards.

Junior tailback Jim Pizano had his best game of the season, weaving

Mooney's play benefits UM's cause

Football teams watch game tapes. They watch them to find repetition, mistakes or that certain something that may give them an edge against opponents.

The Massachusetts football team is no exception.

On Sundays, the team gets together to review the previous game. During the week, players go down to the football office to study next week's opponent.

Bryan Mooney, UMass' senior free safety, is no exception.

And because of that extra effort watching film during the week, Mooney had one of the most memorable football games of his career against Rhode Island on Saturday, an 18–14 UMass victory that gave the embattled Minutemen (1– 3) their first win of the season.

It was first down for Rhode Island on its own 44-yard line. James Jenkins, the Rams starting tailback, took the hand off from quarterback Billy Jack Haskins and ran to the the right behind his tackle. Mooney, who had come in too far on the play, found himself behind Jenkins and sprinted after him. Jenkins was just a few yards past the line of scrimmage when he motioned to cut to the left side of the field for extra yardage. That's when Mooney came up from behind Jenkins and stripped the ball clean out of his hands.

"I over ran the play," Mooney explained. "He cut, and when he does that his right arm comes out. I went right for the ball and it came out."

The ball went spinning end over end in the air. Strong safety Jerard White recovered the football for the Minutemen on URI's 48 yard–line. UMass went on to score its first touchdown of the afternoon.

"It always helps when you get turnovers," Mooney said.

Mooney had discovered Jenkins' weakness last week when watching footage of him against other teams. Every time Jenkins went to cut left, he would leave his arm unprotected. It was the one flaw that Mooney took advantage of, and his forced fumble propelled the Minutemen to their first victory of the season.

But that turnover was not the only one Mooney was involved with during the game. With 36 seconds left to go in the first half, Mooney found himself in the right spot at the right time.

Starting at their own 18, the Rams were pushing the ball down field, looking to erase a 12–7 UMass lead. Thirty–one yards and three minutes later, the Rams faced a critical third down and six when Jeff Weaver, the third quarterback of the day for URI, stepped back in the pocket. But Weaver's throw sailed high, and Mooney stepped right into its path.

"I went right to me," said Mooney of his first career interception.

Mooney was instrumental throughout the entire game on Saturday. During the first half, he was all over the field, making stops and shadowing where the ball was being carried.

He ended the game with seven tackles, four unassisted, including one in which he tackled Jenkins for a nine–yard loss.

After four games, Mooney is well on his way to shattering his career record of 74 tackles in one season. He already has 49 tackles, with seven games to go. Overall, Mooney has 222 tackles over his career.

Mooney is a fifth–year senior who returned this season after being granted a medical redshirt last season. Taking over the role as free safety, he has assumed the role as the leader of the secondary — calling the defensive sets during the course of the game.

"I'm glad I had the year off," Mooney said. "It gave me some

OT goal lifts UMass over Owls

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

Kerry Lyons was in the right place at the right time, and it paid off for the Massachusetts field hockey team, as the Minutewomen held off Temple, 2–1, in overtime.

Lyons pocketed the game winner 6:43 into sudden death overtime to give UMass the win at Richard F. Garber Field.

"I went for everything when I saw the ball," Lyons said. "I knew it would be huge win, especially because it's a conference game."

Not just a conference game, but a big one at that.

"This was a huge conference game," Shea said. "If you can take a conference game at home like this, it will help you down the road. At the end of the season, one of our last games in on grass. That's such an unpredictable surface, you want to have wins already under your belt."

For a good part of the game, it didn't appear that the Minutewomen would be able to claim the win. Temple's speed frustrated UMass' transition game, which only added to the pressures of playing a come–from–behind contest.

Temple scored first — and early — to put UMass at an immediate disadvantage. Just over seven minutes into regulation, the Owls were awarded a penalty stroke because of a dangerous situation in front of the UMass cage.

Renita Bergey answered the call for Temple and sent a hip–level shot past UM goalie Zowie Tucker on her right side.

"I thought the call was a bit dubious," Tucker said. "The girl shoved [UMass midfielder] Vicky [Browne] onto me. It was dangerous and I certainly didn't like seeing my teammate bulldozed by three girls."

KENNETH W. P. SCOTT / COLLEGIAN

Erica Johnston scored the tying goal in UMass' 2-1 field hockey win over Temple yesterday.

Once Temple scored, UMass had trouble making an offensive strike. But the Minutewomen stymied the Owls' efforts as well.

Therefore, the game turned into a battle at the midfield, and Sharon Hughes and Laura Phelan consistently gathered the ball for the Minutewomen.

"There were a lot of heroes in this game," Shea said. "Laura hasn't played in three weeks because she was injured and she had a great game."

Phelan did not start the game, instead she came off the bench to replace Lucy Koch, who was forced out of the game after getting injured. Koch did not return.

UMASS	2
Temple	1

Koch was not the only player caught in the fray of a physical game. Two Temple players received green cards, and several Owls ended up on the ground on different plays.

UMass had its share of physical contact as well. Late in the second half, junior Erica Johnston was forced to switch uniform jersies with Chris Millbauer, after Johnston's jersey was bloodied.

"It was an aggressive game," Shea said. "People think that this game is not a contact sport just because there are women in skirts out there. But it is a contact sport, it's very physical."

With 16:45 left in regulation, Temple attacked on a penalty corner. When the ball got past Tucker, senior sweeper Amy Ott dove and cleared the ball.

"It was just a reaction, to be honest," Ott said. "That's my job. If the ball gets past the goalie, I have to go for it."

After Ott's defensive save, any momentum to be had shifted UMass' way, but the Minutewomen still had trouble in Temple's circle.

With 15:51 remaining in regulation, Johnston faced Temple goalie Deb Brown alone, but missed the ball on her swing.

Still, the flow of the game favored UMass. In the first half, the Minutewomen had just one corner to Temple's four. In the second frame, the margin was six–two in UMass' favor.

But the Temple was able to counter the corner and keep UMass at bay. Until Johnston found the right grip and her characteristic drive.

With 1:35 on the clock, Johnston unleashed a powerful drive off a penalty corner that Brown had little chance of stopping.

"We videotaped her drives at practice and found that she put her palm on the back side of the stick. That

UM's "Kids" cruise past Dukes, Bonnies

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Correspondent

The New Kids on the Block.

That's the nickname people have given the 1997 Massachusetts volleyball team.

It certainly seems justifiable. With only two players graduating before the turn of the century (Lesley Nolan and Michelle Paciorek graduate this spring), it isn't such a bad name. In fact, it kind of has a nice ring to it.

But it doesn't look as though these women will be going away any time soon, unlike their musically gifted counterparts.

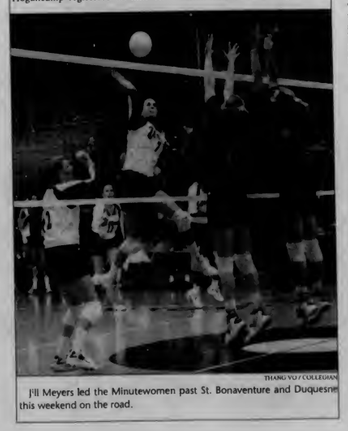
This weekend, UMass improved its record to 8–5 and a perfect 4–0 in the conference with two wins on the road, against Atlantic 10 rivals St. Bonaventure and Duquesne.

It was the first conference road trip for the Minutewomen, after opening up at home last weekend with wins over Dayton and Xavier.

On Saturday, the squad travelled to Pittsburgh to grapple with the Dukes, and came out with a 3–15, 15–4, 15–11, 16– 14 victory.

Sophomore outside hitter Kari Hogancamp registered 12 kills on the night, while Nolan and sophomore Sarah Watters chipped in with 10 apiece.

Freshman setter Jennifer Drennan distributed the ball well, dishing out 39 assists for the Minutewomen.



Friday night's match saw sophomore Jill Meyers take control, knocking down a team–high 15 kills, leading UMass to a 15–6, 15–4. 13–15, 15–5 win over the Bonnies in Olean, N.Y.

Meyers, who connected on 50 percent of her attacks, also contributed seven digs and six blocks. Nolan collected 10 kills and 14 digs, while Watters and Paciorek added 13 and 10 kills, respectively.

Drennan handed out 54 assists, helping the Minutewomen get five players in double digits in kills for the second consecutive match.

After she set her way to a single match record of 83 assists last weekend against Dayton, Drennan is on pace to break the single season record set by Katie Pearce last season.

The Minutewomen will begin a five–match homestand at the Curry Hicks Cage starting on Wednesday when the Rhode Island Rams come to Amherst. Match time is set for 7 p.m.

Brit votes swing left in elections

BRIGHTON, England (AP) — A prominent insider in Britain's ruling Labor government was defeated Monday in elections for the party's executive committee.

Peter Mandelson, widely credited as a key architect of Labor's landslide victory in May elections, was defeated for a vacant seat on the committee by Ken Livingstone, a left-wing member of the party.

"It is a very respectable vote and I will build on it for the future," said Mandelson, who finished eighth in the race for seven seats.

Livingstone, known as "Red Ken" during his days as leader of the Greater London Council, said: "People in the Labor Party tend either to hate me or to love me."

Diane Abbott, another member of the party's left-wing who won re-election to the committee, rejoiced in Mandelson's defeat. "A great operator, a great fixer, could not get himself operated and fixed onto the National Executive," she said.

"This ballot showed a major shift to the Left, without any doubt at all. All the candidates from the socialist group had increased votes," said Dennis Skinner, another veteran of the left who won re-election.

Carey controversy spurs election rerun

WASHINGTON (AP) — A federal judge appointed a new overseer yesterday to decide whether Teamsters President Ron Carey should be disqualified from a rerun election against challenger James P. Hoffa.

And without awaiting a decision on Carey's fate, U.S. District Court Judge David Edelstein also said ballots will be mailed to the union's 1.4 million members on Jan. 9. The vote count will begin Feb. 6.

"It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of maintaining free and democratic [Teamsters] elections," wrote Edelstein, who has presided since 1989 over a consent decree the union signed with the Justice Department to avoid federal racketeering charges. Edelstein appointed former U.S. District Court Judge Kenneth Conboy to decide the whether Carey can be held responsible for the fund-raising scheme that led Conboy's predecessor to set aside Carey's December 1996 victory.

Conboy is already familiar with the issues in the case. He has served as the "special master," ruling on appeals under the consent decree before they advance to Edelstein's courtroom. Barbara Zack Quindel, the previous election officer, recused herself after new testimony implicated an associate of one of her investigators and the New Party, a small political party to which she belongs.

Students cope with death of peer; Mental Health, REFLECT reach out

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

As young adults, most students at the University of Massachusetts have never experienced the death of a loved one or friend.

When the death of a friend occurs suddenly and unexpectedly, many people are left grieving and confused. Many find themselves experiencing emotions never felt before and, above all, ask themselves "Why?"

For many UMass students this situation became a reality this past weekend when junior Adam Prentice died as a result of injuries sustained when he fell through the glass roof of a greenhouse at the Morill Science Center.

Campus officials and health care providers want students to know that feelings of grief is a natural response to death.

There are people and places on campus to go to for help while trying to comprehend the mixed feelings they are experiencing.

Associate Director of Mental Health Services, Lynette Bloise said, "People who are dealing with the loss of a friend or someone they care about are going through a process of revealing memories and adjusting to life without that person."

Residents of Field Residence Hall, where Prentice lived, have been attending meetings with their Resident Director (RD), Resident Assistants (RA) and mental health professionals since Saturday morning when they were informed of his death.

Director of Housing Services, Michael Gilbert, said all RD's and RA's "go through extensive periods of training in crisis intervention and emergency response."

RA's are informed of resources available on campus to students who are grieving.

According to Bloise, the grieving process takes place in many forms and for various lengths of time. Some students feel upset while others become very angry at the deceased. Some people talk of emptiness, of feeling no emotions at all. Bloise explained that all of these responses are normal.

"Students who have never experienced a loss before are very confused about their feelings," she said. "They don't know how to explain what they are feeling. People who have experienced a loss before sometimes feel as if their emotions of grief from the past are coming back."

In addition to the emotions, Bloise said it is important to recognize physical ailments as signs of grief as well.

Physical symptoms such as insomnia, stomach cramps, body aches and pains, recurring headaches and many others can all be attributed to grief, explained Bloise.

"The body is worn, it isn't sure how to respond. People feel things in their bodies that are not associated with their feelings. It's all part of the grieving process," she said.

According to Bloise, it is important to seek help when grief begins to interfere with daily life.

To receive help and counseling, students can go to Mental Health Services, REFLECT, a 5–college bereavement support program, the Dean of Students or Public Safety.

In addition to these organizations, Bloise said it is also important for students to reach out to their "personal support systems."

"Reach out to people important in your life. Go to a spiritual leader, a close friend. Friends are there to be supportive and are a good source of comfort," she said.

Bloise added that many people try to deny that they are going through the grieving process.

"It is a natural process to go through. It is a part of healing and people must except that."

For grieving counseling, students can call REFLECT at 577–5316, Mental Health at 545–2537, Dean of Students Office at 545–2684, and Public Safety at 545–2121.

African amnesty commission petitioned

By Pat Reber
Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — After today, the big question in South Africa won't be who wants forgiveness for atrocities committed during the struggle over apartheid — but who gets it.

From army generals to ragged guerrillas, more than 7,000 South Africans have petitioned the Truth and Reconciliation Commission for amnesty since its creation two years ago.

Their testimony on killings, torture and other atrocities has shed light on some of the horrors wrought by more than three decades of white minority rule — although others remain veiled and after Tuesday, may never be known.

Once the deadline for amnesty applications passes, people who may have committed atrocities will be subject to prosecution and may be reluctant to divulge their secrets.

So far, some notable figures, including Winnie Madikizela-Mandela, the former wife of South African President Nelson Mandela, have refused to apply for amnesty for past political crimes.

Still, almost two years after being appointed by President Mandela, the commission led by retired Anglican Archbishop Desmond Tutu appears to have more successes than failures in trying to help heal the divisions and bitterness that linger from the apartheid era.

For a nation still struggling to understand what happened during apartheid, the process has exposed the extent of the suffering, hatred and malevolence that permeated the struggle between a minority clinging to power and a majority trying to take it. "It is a painful process (which has revealed) the conflict was much wider than black and white," said Fazel Randera, one of the 17 commission members.

While some aspects remain hidden, such as who held ultimate responsibility for atrocities committed by government forces and anti-apartheid guerrillas, the panel's work has brought some mending.

Bodies of missing activists have been located with the help of testimony, enabling families who had still har-

U.S.-India relations: less wariness, more warmth

By George Gedda
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — As the world's largest democracies, the United States and India seem to have reason enough for close ties, but that always has proved to be an elusive goal. Now, things may be changing.

Over the years, presidents and secretaries of state have logged millions of miles on foreign travels, rarely touching down in India. It has been 19 years since the last presidential visit and 14 years since the last visit by a secretary of state.

Suddenly, India is becoming an "in" place for America's political elite. Secretary of State Madeleine Albright will visit before the end of the year and President Clinton will travel there in early 1998. Pakistan, and perhaps Bangladesh, also will be on Clinton's itinerary.

Until recently, political ties with India had not kept pace with economic gains. U.S. trade with and investment in India have risen dramatically since India embraced market reforms seven years ago. The United States is India's leading trading partner, and American investment in India leads all others.

U.S. exports to India reached $37.3 billion last year, up 60 per cent in three years. India's exports to the United States jumped from $21.5 billion in 1993 to $33 billion last year.

The potential for more trade is substantial. India has been officially identified by Washington as one of 10 "big emerging markets" around the world for U.S. exports.

At the political level, the Cold War was an obvious deterrent to friendly ties. The United States resented the friendship between India and the Soviet Union. India, in turn, was put off by the close U.S. ties with Pakistan, often an enthusiastic anti-communist U.S. ally.

Despite differences with New Delhi, there is strong admiration in the United States for India's ability maintain its democracy, notwithstanding its ethnic, religious, linguistic and class differences.

"India may be the greatest single triumph of democracy during this century of change and transformation," says Sen. Dick Lugar, R-Ind., one of the Senate's leading foreign policy experts. The Clinton administration seems intent on using 50th anniversary independence celebrations in India and Pakistan to enhance U.S. ties with both. Until recently, a U.S. gesture toward one of the two was invariably viewed with suspicion by the other. A recent improvement in the mood between

Course lectures look into groups of organized hatred

By Bryan Schwartzman
Collegian Staff

One of the common links between groups such as the Ku Klux Klan, Neo–Nazi Skinheads, militia groups and the Nation of Islam, is their organized expression of anti–Semitism, said Lauren Levin in her bi–monthly course and lecture series.

Levin, the Eastern States Civil Rights Director for the ADL (Anti–Defamation League), is teaching a one credit class which is open to the entire student body, "Anti–Semitism Today: From The Subtle To The Extreme." The course is offered through the Judaic Studies Department and is held at Hillel House.

Last Thursday the topic of discussion was, "Extremist Groups and other Organized Expressions of Anti–Semitism."

"The Northeast has more incidents of hard–core violence, but the south has more organized groups," Levin said.

Beginning with the Klan, Levin gave a brief history of each movement and the different factions within them. According to Levin, the Klan which was founded in 1886, currently has fewer members than ever following a resurgent boom in the 1970's and 80's.

The Knights of the Ku Klux Klan, a subgroup of the Ku Klux Clan founded by David Duke, tried to mainstream themselves in the 70's. This particular branch of the Klan traded their white robes for suits and ties, and allowed Catholics and women to join, strengthening the Klan's support.

Levin said in 1981 there were 11,000,500 registered Klan members, as opposed to 2,500 today. Lawsuits from the Southern Poverty Law Center, headed by Morris Dees, over various wrongful death suits, have depleted the Klan's funds.

Levin then spoke about Neo–Nazi Skinheads and militia groups which seem to be on the rise. She said that these groups are more likely to commit acts of violence than the Klan.

"Really bad combination, hate and drugs [Skinheads], hate and weapons [militia groups]," she said.

She pointed out that not all Skinheads practice hate and not all militia groups expose anti–Semitism. She said some Skinheads simply adopt the values of the English working class without embracing hate and drugs, and some militia groups only focus on a dislike of the government without targeting minority groups.

Theer are approximately 4000 Skinheads in 40 states. Since 1988 there have been 42 murders attributed to skinheads she said. There were none in Massachusetts until Skinheads were accused of beating a teenager to death in his home last Halloween.

Several months prior to the Oklahoma City Federal Building Bombing, the ADL published a study warning of the rising trends militia groups. The study received little attention until the bombing when it became a widely requested document.

"The bombing showed the public that hate and terrorism had reached the US, but those of us who work in the field already knew that," she said.

Levin briefly discussed the Nation of Islam, saying that the rhetoric of leader Louis Farrakhan often fluctuates. Even though he has toned down his anti–Semitism to accommodate upcoming World Atonement Day, he mentioned the word "Jew," 43 times at a recent speech in Springfield, she bored hopes of finding their loved ones alive to come to terms with the loss. "We should never underestimate the healing that has come," said Wynand Malan, another Truth Commission member. "Healing itself is not reconciliation, but it (helps) people manage their future."

But others say some secrets remain hidden.

"There are a lot of unanswered questions," said commission member Richard Lyster. "There are ANC people who should have come forward but who haven't ... and military people."

After the amnesty deadline passes, the panel will concentrate on evaluating amnesty applications, deciding who is telling all they know and determining what reparations should be offered victims of apartheid abuses.

Under the mandate that established the commission, applicants judged to have fully revealed their involvement in abuses and able to prove they were politically motivated can be spared prosecution. On the other hand, people implicated in apartheid-era crimes who fail to apply for amnesty could face criminal charges based on information provided by people who have. For example, Mandela's ex-wife has been accused in the amnesty applications of at least three former associates of ordering killings.

Originally set for December 1996, the deadline for seeking amnesty was postponed until May 10, 1997. A second extension, until midnight Sept. 30, became necessary due to a bureaucratic glitch. About 7,000 people have applied for amnesty, but more than 2,500 were rejected without hearings because applicants denied guilt or offered no proof their actions were politically inspired, said panel spokesman John Allen.

The commission has granted amnesty to about 50 of the 150 applications it has assessed. It will hear another 1,600 cases before April, the scheduled conclusion of its amnesty hearings. Only a few of the amnesty cases so far have been sensational, such as the amnesty granted former police Sgt. Brian Mitchell last year for 11 murders in an attack on a black homestead in KwaZulu-Natal province.

Mitchell's amnesty showed others the commission was sincere in its mission, and top officials such as former Law and Order Minister Adriaan Vlok and retired police Gen. Nic van Rensburg eventually submitted applications.

The process of gathering thousands of statements from victims and hearing confessions from their torturers and killers has been grueling, with people crying and fainting, or sometimes shouting in anger at those admitting they pulled the trigger or applied the cattle prod.

Children's home fire, 30

By Federico Quilodran
Associated Press

COLINA, Chile — A fire swept through a home for retarded children in this northern Santiago suburb early yesterday, killing 30 residents, including several who didn't recognize the danger and walked back into the burning building after being rescued. Three children and one firefighter were injured. Authorities took 134 survivors to a nearby school.

An electrical short circuit caused the fire, according to a preliminary report by the fire department. Residents' relatives complained that the facility was in disrepair and understaffed. Some youngsters suffocated when they walked back into the building.

"Apparently, some children thought it was some kind of a game, I don't know, but firemen said it happened several times," said Guillermo Vidal, vice president of Coanil, the private foundation that administered the home.

Isabel Patino, another Coanil official, said the children appeared to be attracted by the fire and "totally lacked the notion of danger." It was not clear why the adults on hand were unable to keep the children away from the fire.

Ms. Patino said all the victims were retarded people, aged six to 40, though most were children. While the home was established for retarded children, it also housed some adults.

Ms. Patino described the degree of retardation of the victims as ranging "from severe to extreme... That was one reason for the high number of victims."

She said virtually all the residents took medication "under medical supervision" but added "that doesn't mean they were drugged."

The 10-year-old brick building is in the countryside outside Colina, a suburb just north of Santiago.

Luis Paredes, whose son survived the fire, complained that the home was badly in need of repair and lacked the most basic fire safety features. It was not immediately clear if the home had sprinklers.

Other relatives complained that the home was understaffed during the night. They said only seven people were in charge when the fire broke out.

Vidal said since some patients suffered from both mental and physical disabilities, it would have required "one person per patient" for a complete evacuation.

"It was impossible to rescue more children, especially those who were immobile," said one of the home officials, who identified himself only as Nacho.

He said the firefighters arrived at the scene within minutes but "there wasn't much they could do as the fire spread quickly." Justice Minister Soledad Alvear, visiting the site, acknowledged that lack of money is a serious problem for Coanil but insisted that all of its children were cared for properly. Guillermo Moris, whose 11-year-old son was hosptialized in serious but stable condition, said he was satisfied with the care his son received at the home.

President Eduardo Frei said the government will help Coanil rebuild the home and aid the victims' families, most of whom are poor.

Nichols begins trial with "clear page"

By Steven K. Paulson
Associated Press

DENVER, Colo. — With a promise from the judge that he is starting with a "clear page," Oklahoma City bombing defendant Terry Nichols went on trial Monday in the same courtroom where Timothy McVeigh was convicted and sentenced to die.

Nichols, 42, smiled and waved to his mother in the front row as he was escorted into the courtroom where the process began to select 12 jurors and six alternates.

Prosecutors say Nichols was a supporting player in the deadliest act of terrorism on U.S. soil, acquiring fertilizer and other components, robbing a firearms dealer to finance the attack and helping McVeigh build the bomb. They also say Nichols helped McVeigh stash the getaway car in Oklahoma City three days before the blast.

U.S. District Judge Richard Matsch noted there were many similarities to McVeigh's trial, including identical charges that could bring the death penalty. But he added: "This a different case. ... It begins with a clear page."

Nichols appared for the first day of trial in an an open-collar shirt, blue blazer and khaki pants.

In the courtroom and throughout the federal building, security was tight, with police making periodic patrols. Outside, the crowd was significantly smaller than the one at the opening of McVeigh's trial. An hour before court began, there were four spectators in line, compared with about 50 for opening day of McVeigh's trial. There was a smaller media contingent too, with many organizations sending smaller staffs.

The courtroom was only three-fourths full for the first day of jury selection; it was full when McVeigh's trial opened.

For Charles Tomlin, who lost his grown son, Rick, in the bombing, the turnout was predictable. But he said the trial is no less significant.

The grade for the course involves a semester project which will function as an educational tool revolving around tolerance. The projects can range from articles and pamphlets to web page design.

"Hate groups are so adept at using the internet, it would be nice to have some people exposing tolerance on the web," Levin said.

Not everyone in attendance was taking the course for credit. Justin T. Turrley, a junior psychology major from Amherst College said, "it is just insane, I can't understand how any rational person would join one of these groups."

India and Pakistan, U.S. officials say, has enabled the United States to be more engaged with both.

The prime ministers of both countries showed up for this year's U.N. General Assembly, and Clinton met separately with them during his brief visit to New York last week. Only one other foreign leader had a separate meeting with Clinton: Russian Foreign Minister Yevgeny Primakov.

The most divisive Indo-American issue involves India's refusal last year to sign a U.S.-backed global treaty to ban nuclear testing. India says the treaty is flawed because it does not require the declared nuclear powers to destroy their arsenals. Albright has a connection to the subcontinent through her father, Joseph Korbel. New world order comes to UMass

R. Jay Allain

Those building–occupying radicals at UMass really did it this time. Not only did you get the state legislators' attention at the State House, you really got them incensed. Did you forget they were elected to decide how this state — and its flagship university — are to be run? Mere college students should have no say and besides, if these takeovers keep up, real democracy could break out. Egads!

A campus where the CIA is banned, military research is strictly monitored and then phased out and where students of color are afforded the services required to excel while actually encountering more than a smattering of faculty members who look at them. And then it's little surprise the legislators are worried.

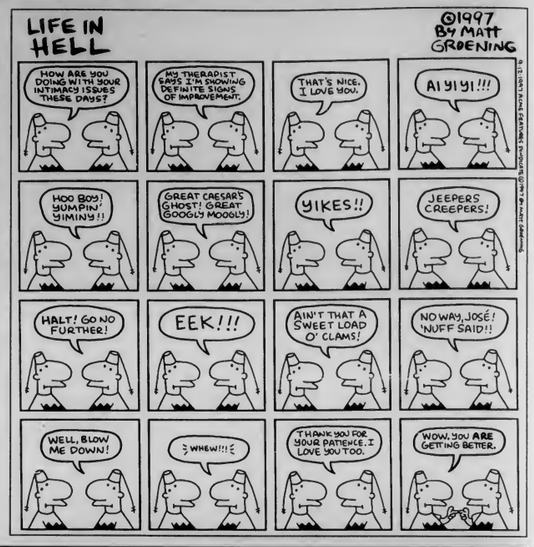
So, let us examine recent world changes for some perspective here. Those of us reared in the heyday of the Cold War can recall the repeated warnings (I must desist from employing the word 'brainwashing') about the grim, totalitarian nature of the Soviet system of government. The Communist party there seemed to be externally run by portly white males bedecked in raccoon coats (or some more expensive material) who would stand outside in freezing temperatures and gaze at long columns of troops and mobile missiles for hours. By implication, U.S. politicians were all warm, cuddly types. "Regular guys," who always had the people's best interests at heart. Boy, were we duped.

Yet brainwashing, er, conditioning is tenacious. Layers of ideological spin do not yield overnight. But for me, the first powerful realization that power is power — whether garbed in Communist or so-called democratic trappings — came reading a fascinating letter Vaclav Havel wrote in 1975 to Dr. Gustav Husak, then the head of the ruling (Communist) party in Czechoslovakia.

Havel, later to become president of a "free" Czechoslovakia, scolded Husak about the endless political propaganda the Party churned out and summarized it: "[T]here emerges one specific and meaningful message, one realistic piece of advice: 'Avoid politics if you can; leave it to us! Just do what we tell you, don't try to have deep thoughts and don't poke your nose in things that don't concern you! Shut up, do your work, look after yourself — and you'll be alright.'"

And basically, if one includes the line, "And be sure to vote," how much different is the message we get here as U.S. citizens form our government? Hardly any different.

But now, and here's the key difference, the message doesn't just emanate from Washington, D.C. — it shouts out from Beacon Hill, too, and is now personalized specifically for student activists at UMass: "Take over our buildings and our gloves are coming off. We won't stand for it anymore."



Oh no? Well, you think people in ghettos and in Third World countries like to put up with roaches and rats and high infant mortality rates? Can they just unionize and say "Get the multinational corporations and U.S.–trained military advisers out now. We've had it. We want good schools and clean drinking water and adequate health care?" No, they can't.

But state legislators like Dennis Murphy (D–Springfield) and Boston Globe columnist Jeff Jacoby have had enough. The former has publicly referred to student activists as "derelicts" and Jacoby wrote of the "illegal violence" of takeovers.

And when they tell UMass to crackdown, crackdown they must! After all, if citizens made the decisions based on their consciences and were more willing to take risky stands for their beliefs, what kind of world would this be? We certainly can't have students learning this message during their formative years.

Overall, it's not clear what impact the new ban on takeovers will have. For one who has been involved in such subversion in the past — and has faced abstinent administrators and unruly police behavior directly — I hardly think UMass officialdom's track record is one of "coddling." But in today's climate of "button–downed minds" and the frantic rush for position in the rat race, UMass' tradition of grassroots' occupations is too dangerous. Go back to your classes and leave policy decisions up to the ruling elite.

Time to fix Ombuds situation

To the Editor:

To paraphrase the old saying, "If it is broken, fix it." Obviously, not only has the current Ombudsperson broken his ability to function effectively, but also the criteria used to hire for this position is broken. Although many former Ombudspersons at UMass have functioned in an exemplary manner, there remain larger systematic flaws which must be addressed.

Namely, the fact that the overriding criterion for the positon is that the Ombudsperson must be a faculty member (this is not the case at many other colleges and universities). This potentially compromises that person's ability to maintain the neutrality essential to their job. A fairer criterion would be hiring someone who does not hold another position at this University.

Though a well–meaning person might apply for the position, the job description as presently constituted does not require that an applicant have academic or skill–based experience in resolving conflicts and grievances. Without extensive training and a strong background in mediation and conflict resolution, this is a recipe for failure. This seems clearly to be the case with the current Ombudsperson, Robert Ackermann. It is not surprising (although it Is unfortunate) that we find ourselves with an Ombudsperson who seems unqualified to effectively perform the required duties of his office. In addition, it is not surprising that we find ourselves with an Ombudsperson who clearly lacks the sensitivity and experience to put into practice the long– established principles of confidentiality, neutrality and maintaining trust.

Without trust there is no reason to seek the services of the Ombudsperson. Just imagine that you are a student and have a dispute about your grade, just imagine that you are an employee and have a complaint about your supervisor, just imagine that you are an academic department chair and have difficulty with another faculty member, wouldn't you expect a fully qualified Ombudsperson with extensive to assist you in handling your case with fairness, neutrality and confidentiality?

Well, that does not seem to be what we currently have here. I, personally, would not seek the services of Robert Ackermann as Ombudsperson nor would I recommend him to others. Since it is apparent that he has compromised his position I would hope he would step down and that the criteria to hire his successor would be changed so that we never find ourselves in this position again.

Didion's views seem racist

To the Editor:

It is a fine line that Keith Didion (Sept. 24, 1997) walks in attacking all forms of ethnic discussion or acknowledgement as racism. His blatantly American, individualistic approach to the problem proves him to be more of a racist than he thinks. In the racist's view, he says, an individual is unimportant. And in Mr. Didion's view, a group consciousness means nothing.

Often times, to separate oneself from one's culture, or to view every individual as separate in his or her culture, is to deny a basic psychological idea — child development. If an individual is directly influenced by their race and upbringing, why must they be constantly separated from this heritage? It is a disservice! Every individual's accomplishments cannot be measured, so why the attempt? Would Mr. Didion rather we not acknowledge race at all? Perhaps.

I'll be the first to admit that group–think strongly influences traditional racism. And, indeed, racism comes in many forms. But to praise a group, to acknowledge the existence of certain learned and inherited traits and their positive effects, or to apologize on behalf of one group toward another, should not be persecuted. We cannot, no matter how much some people hope, all be the same.

The choice is either reason, along with independent judgement, individual achievement and true self–esteem, or racism, hatred, barbed wire and slave labor camps. Not so! The choice is either ethnic acknowledgement and appreciation — like that practiced in diverse areas such as Hawaii — or a lonely, confused fragmentation of the people. We must revel in our differences, and accept each other's differences. After doing so — only after doing so, can we possibly achieve racial harmony.

FDA makes Red Cross' rules

To the Editor:

I am shocked at the people who protested the American Red Cross Blood Drive. People shouldn't act so rashly. Those protesting were apparently not aware that the Red Cross did not make the decision about homosexual blood donors, but the FDA. They were protesting to the wrong people. I am not saying I agree with the FDA ruling, but I think that they should have been aware that it was not for the Red Cross to decide. Therefore protesting the Red Cross accomplishes nothing but to hinder other potential blood donors. If they have issues, then they should go to the source. It seems to me that they were preaching to the choir and next time maybe someone should check their facts.

What it means to be, but how not to become multicultural

Christine Soh

The struggle that began in Goodell continues. The School of Education recently eliminated a program that houses 50 percent of the Native American student population on campus. While the administration still toies a multicultural bag of intentions in terms of recruitment and retention of ALANA students, they continually drop this bag when they stumble over strategic action and restructuring plans.

Last Thursday in a Faculty Senate meeting, graduate student Rodina Cole–Cave brought to the table the recent eradication of the Curriculum and Learning program out of the School of Education. Monique Fordham, also a student in the Curriculum and Learning Program, directly implicated the college's dean, Bailey Jackson, as the party responsible for this decision. Fordham, who spoke following Cole–Cave characterized Jackson's decision as a "personal vendetta... to get rid of the program." In discussions with the Curriculum and Learning faculty and university administration, Jackson has cited "budgetary constraints" as the reason to slate this program. Cole–Cave, in an article co–written with Jennifer Fasulo, also a graduate student from the School of Education, states several facts about the funding of this program.

In the September 1997 issue of The Graduate Voice, Cole– Cave and Fasulo wrote, "the Curriculum and Learning program receives little to no funding from the School of Education. Unlike other programs in the School of Education, Curriculum and Learning receives no money for student assistantships from the School of Education. It receives a paltry amount of funding for supplies. Faculty salaries are not paid from the School of Education's operating budget and will be paid regardless of the faculty's program affiliation." As the above argument is completely factual, the obvious discrepancy places Jackson in a highly suspect position, especially considering the university's so– called effort to retain ALANA students.

On issues of multiculturalism, Dean Jackson wrote an article in The Campus Chronicle's February 26, 1993 edition. It was entitled "What it Means to Be, and How to Become Multicultural" and most likely was written as an administrative response to the outcry of ALANA students and the 1992 ALANA Agreements as it was also included in a report of the Task Force on Multiculturalism and Diversity in July, 1994. It included several important suggestions concerning the attainment of a multicultural campus.

In a section entitled, "Importance of Vision," Jackson wrote: "What is our 'vision' of a multicultural campus?

What is goodness? For some, the vision or goal has been to make the campus and its organizational units less oppressive, on the assumption that if we get rid of the disease (social oppression) we will have health (a multicultural campus). For others, the goal has been to make the campus more numerically inclusive (proportionally representative of various social and cultural groups) and civil, on the assumption that if we work toward becoming more civil and numerically inclusive that the system of social oppression will work itself out in the process or at least diminish as a result. I find myself taking the position that the goal must include both being less socially oppressive as well as more inclusive of social diversity. While it seems the goal that brings together attention to social oppression and social inclusion is the one we should be pursuing, I would emphasize the importance of attending to the manifestations of social oppression first if we are to have any chance of achieving and benefiting from social inclusion... the more social oppression we are able to eliminate the more we allow for energy, interest and success at achieving social inclusion — becoming a multicultural campus."

Jackson stresses eliminating oppression on the level of organizational units. In the context of this university, here would equate to having programs and departments on the institutional level to engage diverse social groups in the multicultural ideal. He also expresses that through inclusion, the recruitment and retention of socially oppressed groups is a necessity. So then, why would he say one thing and act out another?

We must assume that Dean Bailey Jackson agrees in making UMass a multicultural campus since it is the goal of the administration to make this a campus one that "has achieved social justice for all, the full inclusion of the interests and contributions of all social and cultural identity groups, is widely known as an advocate for social justice and diversity and has been successful at using these attributes to enhance the learning environment for all," as stated in Jackson's article. Perhaps the only remedy to this suspicious, unilateral decision made by Jackson, is a complete investigation of why the Curriculum and Learning program was done away with.

He may suggest inclusiveness and civility, but Jackson has cut a program that will eliminate more than half of the Native American student population from this university. There is nothing civil about this. Not only will this cut affect the already small Native American community on campus, but it will also have much larger repercussions. This is best stated in the article written by Fasulo and Cole– Cave. "For many Indigenous nations, the study of Indigenous Education is directly linked to the survival of Indigenous languages and knowledge systems in the face of continued colonization .:. curriculum is an integral part of the study of Indigenous Education."

So, while administrators rolled their eyes to the moving speech given by Cole–Cave last Thursday, the entire campus was once again to enter into a quandary. Are we, or are we not a multicultural campus? Jackson addressed this in the 1993 article. "We must remember it is not helpful to continue our legacy of dualistic thinking on this issue, which frames the issue — we are either a multicultural campus or we are not." In keeping with the '92 ALANA Agreements and in the partially resolved negotiations in Goodell, let's assume that we are.

It is therefore imperative that Dr. Deirdre Almeida's concentration on Indigenous Education remain within the Curriculum and Learning Program as part of the School of Education. Nothing could be more civil and numerically inclusive.

On a side note, immediately after the Faculty Senate meeting, two Collegian reporters tried to speak to Jackson about the elimination of this program but found that the dean had left as soon as the meeting adjourned. The last glimpse they caught of Dean Jackson was as he drove off in a black car, into the sunset, toward Furcolo Hall.

The honors college:
Pulling a PROP 209 East Coast Style

Viraphanh Douangmany

Editor's note: This part two of a three part series.

I met the man who proposed the idea of the Honors College to the Massachusetts Board of Higher Education (BHE). I met the staunch advocate from our Provost's office. I met the man who signed off as the author of the proposal from our campus. I know of the man in the Anthropology Department who actually wrote the proposal. What do these men have in common besides being white and middle–aged with a miserable perception of UMass? They have never graduated from a public institution of higher learning and they all think they can run one — with the exception of the board member who claims to be no expert at all.

Last semester, the Collegian, published an article entitled, "A Wannabe Amherst College," by Lisa Chiu, highlighting efforts from the UMass Amherst administration to make this campus look whiter, richer, smaller, and more elitist. It was talking about the Honors College and how the first news analysts written on it. It basically said these goals will soon be underway starting in the Fall of 1998 if the Honors College is funded by the Massachusetts legislature. The following is a critique of the proposal and a call for all those who support multiculturalism and diversity to stand up and say no to the honors college.

A Background of the Honors College

The idea of establishing an elite honors college in Massachusetts dates back to well over a year ago. Aaron Spencer, a member of the BHE thought this would be a great marketing scheme to improve the "image" of public higher education. Using his position, he requested that all interested institutions come up with a concept paper for an honors college.

On the morning of March 5, 1997, a proposal for an elite honors college of 3,200 students signed by Chancellor Scott landed on the desk of Mr. Spencer. Ironically, this was the same morning students took over Goodell to remind UMass of its promises for diversity and to pay attention to the recruitment and retention of its students of color.

Admissions Criteria of Chancellor Scott's Honors College Proposal

Admissions standards for the Honors College would require that students score a minimum of 1300 on their SATs and be rated in the top 10 percent of their high school graduating class.

As a reward for being so academically gifted, students of the honors college will enjoy state of the art computer facilities, new classrooms, and laboratories set apart from the larger campus. Not only will students of the honors college have separate dormitories, they will have their own faculty, dean, advisors, and a post graduate fellowship office. To finish off this attempt of creating a small, Ivy League feeling, the honors college will be neatly tucked away in Orchard Hill overlooking Mt. Toby.

Mr. Spencer summed up his motivation for an honors college quite succinctly: "It would be hoped that graduates of the honors college after striking it rich in a successful career (due to their esteemed degree from the honors college), contribute in alumni funding, thus making UMass a much better place." However, the repercussions are not as simple as this.

Reasons to Protest the Honors College

When students learned of the proposal a month after its submission, members of the Student Government Association organized a trip for all concerned students to meet Spencer in Boston. The following were some challenges to the honors college:

1. The honors college will institutionalize inequality through tracking or ability grouping.

2. Admissions standards of the honors college are based on SAT scores that have been widely documented to be biased against women, the poor and people of color.

3. The honors college will segregate the campus according to racial, class and gender stratification.

4. The honors college will take resources away from non– honors students, i.e. funding, faculty, library and residential space.

5. The honors college will create two separate and unequal living, learning and educational opportunities and potentially goes against the 1954 ruling of Brown vs. Board of Education.

6 The honors college goes against the mission of public higher education which was founded on the principle of making education accessible for the average working class person.

7. $17 million could be better used to serve other pressing needs that require funding and advocacy rather than renovating an already renovated honors program office space.

Response from Officials

When confronted with these challenges, Spencer kept insisting he knew nothing about education, that he was a business man. He believed, however, that not everyone was academically gifted and felt that those students who would not get into UMass because of the honors college could attend two year colleges instead. Chancellor Scott said he knew very well that the SATs measured socio–economic status rather than ability but insisted that the use of SAT scores were necessary to sort applicants.

Because the SATs are given such heavy emphasis in the admissions criteria of the honors college, I think it is important to visit this topic in a more elaborate manner [see side bar compilation the SCERA Report, Oct.'95].

Over the summer, you might have heard that Chancellor Scott's proposal for the honors college was selected by the Board of Higher Education. By December, the BHE will review the budget reports to be submitted by the University detailing the cost of running the honors college. The BHE will then appeal to the legislature for funding. If the legislature approves it, the opening of the honors college will begin September 1998.

GSS Motion to investigate SOE's decisions

Editor's note: The following motion was unanimously approved at the Graduate Student Senate meeting on September 16, 1997. The motion is relevant to the theme of this page because it calls for a formal investigation into the School of Education's decision to eliminate the Curriculum and Learning Program and the subsequent effect this elimination will have on the ALANA community.

Motion to call for a campus wide investigative committee comprised of students and faculty with equal representation of people of color and whites and equal representation of women and men to undertake a full investigation of the School of Education's distribution of funds, resources, faculty and assistantships and to investigate the reasons behind the targeting and elimination of programs with a majority of students of color in them. In particular, a probe should be made into reasons for the repeated and ongoing attempts to eliminate the Curriculum and Learning Program in the Teacher Education and Curriculum Studies Department. Other inquiries should be made as to the targeting of the Center for International Education, Instructional Technology and the past elimination of Organizational Development.

Rationale: Funds and resources are distributed in vastly unequal ways within the School of Education. Certain programs such as the Social Justice Education program receive funding for eight to 10 TA/TO's while programs such as Curriculum and Learning receive none. The Curriculum and Learning Program has been slated for elimination on the grounds that there is no funding from the School of Education. As mentioned, it receives no money for graduate assistantships. The only significant cost of the program is faculty salaries which do not come out of the School of Education budget. Furthermore, when it came to the attention of the Goodell negotiators that this program was slated for elimination, the issue was brought to the negotiation table. This one program houses more of the native American graduate students on campus than any other. To eliminate this program would in effect eliminate the majority of Native American graduate students on this campus. Assurances were made by administrator's in Goodell (which is on tape) that no such elimination would take place. At the end of the spring semester 1997, Curriculum and Learning passed through two Academic Matters committees, which is the process for approval of programs in the School of Education, yet over the summer, Dean Bailey Jackson made the unilateral decision to eliminate the program anyway. Although the attacks of this program, its faculty and students, are particularly heavy– handed and confounding, this situation is not an isolated event. Other programs such as the Center for International Education, and in previous years, Organizational Development, have been subjected to similar threats of and actual elimination.

Making the Scholastic Aptitude Test (SAT) Optional at the University of Massachusetts

This report was prepared by SCERA, the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy, for the Undergraduate Student Senate, October 4, 1995.

The Standardized Acheivement Test (SAT) does not help colleges predict student success.

It is our goal in making this proposal to increase the standards used by the university for admissions, not to decrease them. In making this proposal, we have given careful consideration to the primary rationale for using SATs in the admissions progess: to help colleges make better selection dcisions in choosing applicants for admissions to their schools. The position articulated by many schools and colleges, and that is most prominently made by the College Board and the Educational Testing Service, is that the tests help predict success (or failure) of a particular applicant at the school in question. However research shows that the SAT Is not a particularly good method and adds very little to predicting success of an applicant beyond what high school grades and class rank may already provide.

In their landmark 1988 study, The Case Against the SAT, James Crouse and Dale Trusheim argued persuasively that the SATs do not help colleges make better academic selection decisions. They argue that on a great majority of their applicants, colleges make identical admissions decisions, either to admit or reject, whether they use the SAT along with the high school record, or the high school record alone. Stack and Porter also found that the SAT adds little to the prediction of college performance over the high school record alone [Harvard Educational Review, V. 50, N.2, May 1980]. And a 1989 New York study found SATs nearly useless in the college admissions process. For three out of four New York colleges, SAT scores failed to yield a prediction of college performance greater than 12 percent better than chance. At half the schools, the SATs predictive power was no better than 4 percent above chance. High school performance (grades and/or class rank) was found to be three times more helpful in predicting college performance than the SAT.

The issue of commercial coaching also brings into question the value of SATs in predicting success. A 1981 study by the Boston Regional Office of the Federal Trade Commission found that there was an approximate 50 point overall increase in the SAT scores for students who were coached, and substantial evidence of a socio–economic difference between those who were coached and those who were not. This study begs the question asked by many educators: "If the SAT truly measure aptitude, how can people be coached so effectively?"

The SAT has been found to be biased against students of color

Crouse and Trusheim found that whites and blacks in the United States have dramatically different SAT scores. The differences, which favor whites, create a very large credential gap. They argue that if selective colleges require blacks to have SAT scores at least equal to those of the whites they admit — no matter what else they look at — all but the least selective colleges in the country will have trouble enrolling even one qualified black for every ten qualified whites.

The SAT has been found to be biased against low–income students

The SAT reduces selective colleges' acceptances of low– income applicants. just as it does with blacks. Studies show that the addition of the SAT to high school rank rejects additional lower–income applicants so that fewer have forecasted grades that exceed the selection cutoff.

The SAT has been found to be biased against women

In a study of over 100,000 test takers, Rosser found that the vast majority of SAT questions which exhibit large gender differences in correct answer rates are biased in favor of males, despite females' superior academic work [Center for Women Policy Studies, Washington, D.C.]. Striker, Rock and Burton also found gender bias in SATs in their 1991 study [College Board Report 91–2, New York: College Entrance Examination Board]. They found that SATs consistently under predict grades for women across all levels of grades, colleges and ethnicity. In addition, a 1989 U.S. District Court, Southern District of New York, decided that the use of the SATs alone in awarding New York State scholarships to be biased against women. The court ruled that the use of the SAT had resulted in 72 percent of the top scholarships going to males. After a careful review of the evidence, the court found that "SAT scores capture a student's academic achievement no more than a student's yearbook photograph captures the full range of their experiences in high school."

The SAT has substantial financial costs

The SATs have financial cost as well. Most students pay over $50 for SAT. Many students also pay between $600– $1000 for commercial coaching classes. In addition, many high schools spend valuable class time on SAT prep courses where students memorize long lists of SAT words and practice taking SAT type tests. This time and money would certainly be better spent on academic subjects.

Who else has made SATs optional?

There are presently approximately 236 schools that have adopted some kind of SAT optional program including such public universities as California State University, Indiana University, University of Arkansas and the University of Oregon.

These state universities, with many similarities in size and mission to the University of Massachusetts, all use various forms of high school performance as their admissions criteria. Grade point average for core high school curriculum is the primary criteria. A report from Bates College which made SAT score submittal optional in 1985, concludes that "the optional SAT policy has had no negative, and quite possibly a positive, impact on the quality of students admitted." Student quality has Increased since Bates adopted the policy; academic performance of the SAT submitter and non–submitters is nearly the same; non–submitters' GPAs are higher than their SAT's would predict.

L.A. Confidential scores as noir mystery

L.A. Confidential
Directed by Curtis Hanson with Russel Crowe, Guy Pearce, Kevin Spacey
Playing at Mt. Farms Theater

Despite its deserving reputation as a mind-numbing corporate monster, the movie industry, or more suitably referred to as Hollywood, is often relentless in its self critiques. From almost as far back as its creation, Hollywood has allowed directors, from Billy Wilder up through Robert Altman and Tim Burton, to mock the concept of the Hollywood dream. Whether it be satire or drama, Hollywood adequately protects itself within all its conventions and genres with its keen sense of humor. L.A. Confidential can now be added to this long list, a film whose purpose is to disrupt Hollywood's sensationalism and prepare distinctive lines separating L.A.'s glamour from its actual violence.

Based on the best selling novel by neo-noir author James Ellroy, L.A. Confidential is a literary masterpiece captured on film. Although it is not flawless in its adaptation, L.A. Confidential contains all it needs to exist as a separate entity, rather than an extension of the novel. In fact, L.A. may just be one of the most refreshing interpretations of the 1950s hardboiled detective mystery to grace the silver screen in years.

As a result of its clever charm and insatiable wit, L.A. Confidential is one extremely serious film which is very careful to not take itself to seriously. Yet, within its slick noirish temperaments, which are set to a plastic coated concept of Hollywood style fame and fortune, L.A. Confidential still manages to fuel an intriguing suspense driven narrative. The film's representations of violence and sexuality are surprisingly both shocking and disturbing and the character's complexities contribute to the film's darker, more cynical side.

Directed by Curtis Hanson, L.A. Confidential is a story about two young police officers whose personalities contradict one another until they are forced to work towards a common goal. Russel Crowe (The Quick and the Dead) is the tough-end thug, a bitter man who's perceived by his peers as an ignorant bully. He fights his way out of his hardened shell in order to vie for the affection of a beautiful hooker, played by Kim Basinger, who has been altered to look like actress Veronica Lake by her philanthropist pimp. Guy Pearce (Priscilla Queen of the Desert) represents the other side of the spectrum, a pretty boy cop concerned with how proper justice and doing the right thing can help him climb the career ladder.

When a mysterious slaughtering occurs at a coffee shop, both men become obsessed with finding the truth in the hope of killing very different personal demons. Pearce believes he is defending justice for the right reasons, while Crowe hopes he can finally make some good out of his life if he can only find the truth. Entangled in this web along with them is Kevin Spacey's marvelous portrayal of the veteran detective who, for a part time gig, serves as technical advisor to a top rated cop show properly entitled "Badge of Honor" as well as selling information to a tabloid magazine called Hush Hush. Spacey's character is where the film's true parody stems from, he won't even make an arrest unless the news photographers can get the Hollywood skyline in the background.

L.A Confidential has all the conventions of a classic noir mystery. There's plenty of drugs, prostitution, violence and corruption all working together towards a rushed, yet explosive finale. Hanson makes his characters so pitiful that their inevitable enlightenment at the end of the film is one of the most satisfying conclusions seen in a film in a long time. It is all summed up best when a line is delivered to Spacey from Pearce, "Why did you become a cop?" So caught up in the glitz and glamour of a pathetic existence Spacey is forced to reply, "I don't remember."

As if this isn't enough, the police captain (James Cromwell from Babe) can't help but say to his criminal victims, "This here is the city of Angels and you don't have any wings." It is lines like these which fuel the passion of L.A. Confidential creating a brilliant look at not only formula conventions but the ideal of Hollywood as well. A

Dylan breaks silence with new album

By Joshua Boyd
Collegian Staff

BOB DYLAN
Time Out Of Mind
Columbia Records

"Sometimes / The silence can be like thunder." So Bob Dylan wrote in the opening track to his new album, Time Out Of Mind. That thunder he mentions has been rumbling for seven years now. In 1990, Bob Dylan released his last collection of originals, Under The Red Sky, produced by Daniel Lanois. What followed was seven years of cleaning up from his latent alcoholism, releasing two of his first mostly-acoustic albums in almost 30 years (the covers albums Good As I Been To You and World Gone Wrong), and recording a classic MTV Unplugged show, a performance that re-affirmed his power as a performer.

With this newly reinforced power, Dylan hit the road many years ago to begin the aptly-titled "Never-Ending Tour." He was writing new songs over a year ago, but stuck with his oldies in a formatted live show night after night. In January of this year, the rumors on the World Wide Web page "Expecting Rain" (http://bob.nbr.no) told of recording dates with Lanois as producer again, and a whole album's worth of new songs.

Seven months later, Time Out Of Mind is now in stores around the world. Embracing a mostly nocturnal, moody quality, that of a P.J. Harvey To Bring You My Love sort of flavor. Lanois produced to the moods of the music. On some songs, the tones and sounds become dark and subversively bluesy, as on the opener, "Love Sick," the simple but original blues riffing of "Million Miles" and "Cold Irons Bound," with its layered guitars eliciting a feel of distance and frigidness. Thus Lanois' production echoes Dylan's noticeably listenable voice to make the bard sound like he's inside the dreams of the woman he is speaking to, furthering these irresistible songs' dark qualities.

Not all songs have this noir quality to them. "Standing In The Doorway" comes off as a tender ballad, with warm organs, romantically thick guitars and Dylan's deep voice bringing to mind one of his musical godfathers' ballad vocal styles, that of "The King," Elvis Presley. "Make You Feel My Love" is the most minimal track, embracing just piano, organ and continuing with endearing lyrics: "When the rain is blowing in your face/ and the whole world is on your case/ I could offer a warm embrace/ to make you feel my love."

Along with these tracks we have songs that stand completely aside from anything else. "Dirt Road Blues" takes on an old-time blues form, with the production styles of Dylan's first electric albums, Bringing It All Back Home, Highway 61 Revisited, and Blonde On Blonde fully encased in this juke-joint style romp. The most up-close and intimate (not to mention normal mid-tempo) music and lyrics is elicited in "Trying To Get To Heaven:" "When you think you've lost everything/ you find out you can always lose a little more/ I'm just going down the road feelin' bad/ trying to get to heaven before they close the door."

The final track, "Highlands" is 16 minutes of a minimal blues with a narrative tale of meeting a woman who wants him to sketch a portrait of her, but with an undercurrent of people expecting too much of him. He explains how out of touch with popular culture he has become, despite being at the top of the pop culture of the '60s: "I don't want nothin' from anyone, ain't that much to take / I wouldn't know the difference between a real blonde and a fake / feel like a prisoner in a world of mystery / I wish someone'd come and push back the clock for me." The song's length is not so bothering as these are the best lyrics on the album.

So, here we are. Seven years of waiting have come to a halt for Dylan fans. All we've got to hope for now is that he'll actually start playing this stuff live. A

KRS–One, De La rock Smith College

De La Soul teamed up with KRS–One for a concert at Smith College's John M. Greene Hall Saturday.

KRSONE AND DE LA SOUL
Smith College
Sept. 28

NORTHAMPTON — There is no reason why any human being should ever put on a performance like KRS–One did on Saturday night at Smith College; it's simply not fair to other MC's. KRS–One is the God of hip–hop and some of us were lucky enough to hear his sermon.

Hip–hop, when performed live, is unique from all other genres of music. When you normally go to a show you have intricate back drops, light shows and a whole band to look at. However when you are at a hip–hop show, it's simply you and the MC. Sure, there's a DJ, but unless you are positioned on the stage the chance of you seeing what he is doing is null. Therefore the MC has to keep you entertained for the duration of the set, no easy task.

KRS–One not only kept the crowd entertained, he kept them trapped in a trance like state. When he stepped off the stage the crowd cheered for more because they did not want to have to return to their world without KRS–One.

KRS–One and D.J. Kenny Parker ripped through all the classics going as far back as Criminal Minded to give the crowd what they needed. However, while hits like "Rapture" had the chicken heads bobbing it was when KRS–One kicked the knowledge that he really set himself apart. KRS– One delivered a freestyle on eating meat that would make even the staunchest meat eater reconsider their dietary habits. Not only did he talk to us about the importance of hip–hop and how meaningful it is in our lives, he went on to talk about everything including the audience members in the front rows. Every time you thought he might run out of steam, he came back out you rawer and harder so you hung on his every word.

In everything there is always the one individual who rises to the top and simply dominates that field like no one else ever has; Michael Jordan has done it in basketball, the Beatles did it In Rock and Roll and KRS–One has done it in hip–hop.

Straight out the 516, De La Soul opened this show and had the crowd moving with no delay. Trugoy, Posdenus and Maseo had the crowd live and consistently slammed them with hits to the cranium.

De La Soul offered a variety of songs running through their history to bringing such hits as "Me, Myself, and I" and "Saturday" from back in the day. They played off the crowd well, something very difficult for an opening act to do, and had the place sweating like a sauna. What set De La Soul apart from most performers is that they thanked the audience for being there for them and putting food on their children's tables. It was nice to see a band who didn't act like they were doing you a favor.

In the middle of KRS–One's set, he stopped and asked the crowd to think about how special an occasion it was to have KRS–One and De La Soul performing in the same place. He also asked the crowd to thank the people of Smith College for putting on a such a spectacular event. There was no doubt that everyone was able to fulfill both requests.

Yanks need to make a statement — despite the fact they won 96 games — that they aren't just a one–year wonder like the 1993 Phillies who got homered from the series by Joe Carter, and have yet to resurface.

The Indians need to prove that their lackluster regular season was a fluke, and that they can compete with the big dogs in big games without Kenny Lofton and Albert Belle.

I hate to say it, but the Yanks should take this one thanks to far superior pitching — if Hideki is left off the post season roster.

• Superior pitching...that'd be nice.

Roger Clemens had perhaps the best season of his career — though he tired near the end of the campaign — with the Toronto Blue Jays, not the Red Sox.

He won 21 games, struck out a career–best 292 batters (Mike Benjamin was caught looking for No. 292. Should that really count?) and had a minuscule 2.05 E.R.A to end the season. All those numbers were tops in the American League, making the Canadian Rocket the first American League pitcher since 1945 to win the pitching triple crown.

Detroit's Hal Newhouser (yeah, the Tigers have had good pitchers before) went 25–9 that season with 212 strikeouts and a 1.81 E.R.A.

There's really nothing more to say except that the Blue Jays, who were dubbed contenders by Clemens, finished dead last in the AL East.

All that aside, Clemens was absolutely masterful this year. Well worth a little extra effort and cash, don't you think?

• My unbelievably coherent and upright colleague, Luke Meredith, predicted the Seattle Mariners to finish this season with a 90–72 record in his season preview column last spring. They did. But, he didn't know that Heathcliff Slocumb was going to become a Mariner. Slocumb gave the M's at least five extra losses.

Nice try Pimp Daddy, but I'm the expert.

were never totally out of it. I really thought we could tie it up."

The discombobulation continued with the Golden Bears' second goal, with a breakdown in communication between senior goalkeeper Danielle Dion and her defense in the 29th minute. Cal's forward Sarah Kaminsky battled with junior defender Amanda Thompson through the middle of the field, with Kaminsky getting the slight physical edge.

Possibly waiting for the phantom offside call, Dion hesitated to come out of the goal, and Kaminsky outscrapped her for the ball, knocking in the goal for the 2–0 lead. Yet, UMass knocked the lead down to 2–1, with senior defender Erica Iverson scoring her second goal of the weekend on a header off an Emma Kurowski corner kick at the 34:29 mark of the match.

However, in the second half, the Minutewomen were not able to get more than three consecutive touches on the ball for a long period of time.

Once again, an opportunity was afforded to UMass, as Carroll dubbed a questionable penalty shot call five feet past the post left of Dion, but a late rush on the Golden Bears' goal was unsuccessful.

For sophomore midfielder Cindy Garceau, nobody wants to face days like these, and the sting of this loss was especially hard.

"You know, when your team plays [badly] and you win, it's not so bad," Garceau said. "But, when your team plays [badly] and you lose...that sucks."

Duquette looks to '98 expansion

So, I guess the Red Sox won't be protecting Wilfredo Cordero in the upcoming expansion draft.

The embattled left fielder was released by Boston minutes after the Sox blew a ninth-inning lead and lost the season finale in Toronto.

This abrupt axing by the Sox front office brings one of the Boston sports scene's most peculiar stories in recent memory to an end.

After allegations surfaced that he struck his wife Ana with a telephone, Cordero apologized for his actions and practically begged for support from the Red Sox and their fans.

Fred Hutchinson Jr.
on
Major League Baseball

Then he was unofficially suspended from the team after he tried playing in a couple road games. Then seemingly all his past girlfriends and wives came forward with accusations of their own. But, before that in an ESPN interview he vehemently denied ever having an abuse problem.

So, the Red Sox organization had its hands tied as to how to handle the situation because they came out in support of their employee when the stuff first hit the fan, then the story got so wild there was nothing for them to do.

To make a long story short, the release of Cordero does nobody any good — the Sox lose a potential All-Star, Cordero loses his job for now and nobody will ever forget this escapade.

All serious controversy aside, this most recent personnel move by Dan Duquette begs the question: "who's stayin' and who's goin?"

Good question.

The Duke warned Sox fans that they are going to be one of only a few teams that could lose three top-quality players in the upcoming Nov. 18 expansion draft.

Buh-bye Troy O'Leary.

They'll probably think about protecting that kid at shortstop...what's his name, Nomar something-or-other. Mo Vaughn's staying (until he gets traded). That's two.

Here's the rest: 3. John Valentin; 4. Jeff Frye (he's fast, can play any position, and hits .285 all the time); 5. Michael Coleman; 6. Reggie Jefferson; 7. Tom Gordon; 8. Brian Rose; 9. Carl Pavano; 10. Bret Saberhagen (experience, experience, and he's not that old); 11. Butch Henry; 12. Jeff Suppan; 13. Ron Mahay (good lefty in the 'pen); 14. Robinson Checo; 15. Donnie Sadler (will get his chance in spring training).

Who does that leave swingin' in the wind?

Tim Naehring, who has never been a healthy major leaguer. There's a chance his injury problems could keep him in a Red Sox uniform, or at least a Boston hospital.

Steve Avery — who cares he's gone. Poor kid peaked at 21.

A whole slew of worthless pitchers: Aaron Sele has proven that potential doesn't count for much. Chris Hammond is just a lefty with an attitude. Mark Brandenburg just can't get batters out. Joe Hudson has always had good numbers, but has never been trusted in a tough spot.

And some pretty decent pitchers: Jim Corsi was phenomenal after the first month of the season. Tim Wakefield eats up innings (and is talking contract with the Duke). John Wasdin at times had the stuff.

Scott Hatteberg is solid but expendable. As is Bill Haselman, but leaving prospect backstop Jason Varitek out there is a gamble.

I know what you're thinkin', "What about Walt McKee?"

Well, he might be safe, but Trot Nixon, who has apparently developed Jeff McNeely disease, won't be protected and might just go late in the draft. The development of Coleman makes Nixon a fallen commodity, and largely a forgotten man.

• Hey Spankee fans, sick of all this Red Sox talk? Still mad about the Derek (Pretty Boy) Jeter over-rated column? Well tough, but here's some good stuff for ya' anyway.

Hideki Irabu pitched five innings and got the win against Detroit Sunday afternoon. He had six strikeouts and lowered his E.R.A. to a scintillating 7.09. What's the Yen-Dollar conversion rate?

Hey Kenny Rogers...how's your ego doin'?

By the way Jeter finished the season at .291, Nomar finished at .306. You don't even want to see the rest of the stats.

But I digress. The Bronx Bombers are in the playoffs and set to face the Indians, while the actual contenders try to knock each other off in the other junior circuit series.

Both the Tribe and New York have a lot to prove in this series. The Massachusetts falls to St. Bonaventure, tops Duquesne

By Jackie Leroux

Life on the road has not been too kind to the Massachusetts men's soccer team. The Minutemen could only pull out one win after three away games, bringing their record to 5–2–1 overall, and 1–1 in Atlantic 10 conference play.

After losing to Hartford 1–0 in double overtime on September 23, UMass hit the road again this weekend to begin their conference schedule. They traveled to Olean, N.Y. to take on St. Bonaventure on Friday, and then made their way to Pittsburgh to play Duquesne on Sunday.

Duquesne	1

UMass	1

The Minutemen fell to the Bonnies, a game they were expected to win rather easily, by a score of 2–1. The Bonnies struck first, with one of two goals from Trevor Carlson, 8:59 into the contest. After going one full season and six games without a goal, James Redmond, a midfielder/forward out of Springfield, scored his first ever collegiate goal, at the 25:36 mark. But that was all UMass could produce, with Carlson scoring again at 39:48 to put it away for St. Bonaventure.

UMass was severely outshot by the Bonnies, 17–9, but both teams were even with corner kicks, each putting in seven. Massachusetts' sophomore keeper Todd Fowler played very well, grabbing nine saves. St. Bonaventure's goalie Chris Salinas put in seven.

Things picked up in Pittsburgh, however, where UMass downed Duquesne 2–1. With Joenal Castma out of the game after receiving a red card, freshman Seth Lilburn scored the game-winning goal. Lilburn now has three goals on the season, tying him with senior Mike Butler for the most goals on the team.

Redmond scored his second career goal, just 3:06 into the contest to put UMass up 1–0. The Dukes tied it up at the 53:31 mark, with a goal from Charlie Roberts.

Lilburn scored his goal with a rebound off his own shot in the 78th minute, sealing the game for the Minutemen.

Fowler had another good game for UMass, with eight saves, to Duquesne keeper Fabrizio Macatiello's two. The Dukes had a 12–5 edge in shots and a 4–1 advantage in corner kicks.

Despite the two losses, The Minutemen are ranked No. 11 in the nation by the NSCAA/Umbro Coaches Poll, and first in New England. They are also ranked No. 16 by Soccer America. Last week Butler was honored as player of the week by the A–10, and Lilburn was named Rookie of the Week. The two were honored for their play in upset wins over No.22 New Hampshire and No. 9 Boston University.

Butler is one of the most prolific scorers in school history, and has a knack for scoring game-winning goals. He stands at fifth all-time in career points, with 74, is tied at seventh for goals with 27, and tied for fourth in assists with 20.

Lilburn has been a pleasant surprise for coach Sam Koch, a freshman from Booton, New Jersey, he leads the team in scoring with 11 points and three goals.

Another bright spot for the Minutemen, they were able to pull out Sunday's win without going into overtime. The Minutemen had a streak of five consecutive overtime games, including the loss to Hartford. They took them well, however, putting up a 3–1–1 mark in those games.

Later this week UMass will continue their A–10 play, bringing things home with a game against St. Joseph's on Friday and a game against Temple on Sunday.

The No. 11 Massachusetts men's soccer team split on its weekend road trip.

UMass ends Texas matches with 2–1 loss to California

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

FARMERS BRANCH, TX. — Nobody told the No. 10 Massachusetts women's soccer team that there would be days like these...strange days, indeed.

Last Sunday afternoon at Cox Field, the Minutewomen (7– 2) lost to California–Berkeley (4–4) by a 2–1 score in the second match of their weekend trip. An exciting 2–1 win over No. 13 Southern Methodist on Friday night started the weekend nicely, but the dreaded letdown was in the northern Texas air; especially with a ration of injuries.

Cal	2

UMass coach Jim Rudy had to rearrange his lineup all weekend long, and combined with the rigors of travel on a young squad, it was just one of those days.

Consequently, the ration of injuries became a buffet as junior midfielder Robin Smith went down in the first minute of the match with a wrenched knee. A goal by Courtney Carroll on a header off the ensuing free kick jolted UMass, and the Minutewomen never fully got back into the match.

Cal–Berkeley was able to keep UMass off-balance with a tight possession game, and the Minutewomen only showed brief glimpses of their offensive continuity.

Rudy was disappointed after the match, with aspects of the game that he could and not control. Losing Smith early left his squad discombobulated, the refereeing was marginal, with the team ailing from various debilitations and the loss of senior defender Amy Burrill to a prior commitment combined with the heat of a Texas fall to sap the energy out of his team.

"With this loss, one of the factors against was losing Smitty early, and we seemed to lose it right after it happened," Rudy said. "We didn't pick up anyone after the injury, and next thing you know, the ball is in the net.

"It was not a pretty game, but we

Women's tennis drop two, fall to Columbia and Rutgers

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Correspondent

An ideal weekend for the Massachusetts women's tennis team would have been to hit the road and sweep its four matches.

However, things didn't turn out according to plan. After disposing of the University of Vermont on Friday afternoon at the Upper Boyden Tennis Courts, the Minutewomen could only muster a 1–2 performance on its trip to Piscataway, New Jersey and New York City. With the 2–2 weekend, the Minutewomen now have a 3–2 overall mark on the season.

On Saturday afternoon the Minutewomen squared off against Rutgers. The Scarlet Knights, however, were up to the challenge, handing UMass a 6–3 defeat.

Ola Gerasimova and freshman Robyn Lebovitz were both winners in singles action, while Gerasimova teamed up with Marie–Christine Caron to pick up a victory in doubles play.

Next up on the slate was a Sunday morning tilt with Georgetown, a match that was added to the schedule early in the season. UMass bounced back from Saturday's loss with a convincing 5–2 win over the Hoyas.

Caron, Lebovitz, Jackie Braunstein and Emily Wegner were all singles winners, while the duos of Gerasimova–Caron and Lebovitz–Caroline Steele each pulled out victories to give the Minutewomen the point in doubles play.

Were two matches on Sunday too much for Massachusetts? The answer may have been found in the second match of the day against Columbia, as UMass dropped a heartbreaking 4–3 decision to the Lions.

Gerasimova, Steele and Lana Gorodetskaya were all victorious in the singles competition, while the combo of Braunstein and Gorodetskaya was a winner in doubles action.

Minutewomen notes...

UMass traveled to Princeton, N.J. last weekend to participate in the Eastern Championships. Lebovitz and Gorodetskaya both advanced to the second round in singles play, while Gerasimova made it to the quarterfinals before falling to Pennsylvania's Anastsia Pozdniakova, who eventually reached the finals. In doubles play, Caron and Steele reached the second round before losing to Michelle Tyson and Lacey Lee of Old Dominion.

The Minutewomen had their match against Colgate canceled yesterday, and will hit the courts next on Oct. 6 when they will travel to Jamaica, New York to face the Red Storm of St. John's.

Agenda set for peace talks in North Ireland

BELFAST, Northern Ireland (AP) — The eight parties in Northern Ireland's peace talks agreed yesterday to discuss the province's most divisive issues during full-scale negotiations, set to begin next week.

In a three-hour meeting that went surprisingly smoothly, representatives of the various parties agreed on an agenda that focuses on relations between the British-ruled north and the Irish Republic, the internal government of Northern Ireland, and on Anglo-Irish relations.

Yesterday's deliberations marked the first time pro-British unionists and supporters of the Irish Republican Army met face to face to actually make agreements.

However, both sides continued their refusal to speak to each other directly and addressed all their remarks to the chairman, Canadian Gen. John de Chastelain.

The British and Irish governments, the co-sponsors of the negotiations, scheduled to start Oct. 7, have set a May deadline for concluding a new political settlement on the future of Northern Ireland.

The Irish Republican Army has been observing a cease-fire since July 20, clearing the way for Sinn Fein, its allied political party, to join the talks.

M.I.T student dies after alcohol induced coma

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. (AP) — A freshman found unconscious amid vomit and empty liquor bottles at a Massachusetts Institute of Technology fraternity has died of an alcohol overdose.

Scott Krueger, 18, of Orchard Park, N.Y., died late Monday, three days after the fraternity pledge was discovered in his basement room at the Phi Gamma Delta house.

His parents said his blood-alcohol level had reached .410 percent — five times the legal limit for drivers in Massachusetts. Authorities say that means he consumed about 16 drinks. The medical examiner said yesterday that Krueger died of an alcohol overdose.

"You'd think people here would be smarter than that. But in some cases, tragic things just happen," said John Fires, 18, an MIT freshman.

It was at least the second such death at at an American university this semester. In August, a Louisiana State University fraternity pledge died at a hospital after a night of drinking. A clean-cut three-letter athlete who graduated in the top 10 of the 325 students in his high school class, Krueger had attended a party at the fraternity earlier that night where he was paired off with a "big brother," and where alcohol was served, school officials said.

Proposal to ban smoking in bars; Local owners opposed to measure

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Correspondent

AMHERST — The Amherst Board of Health is continuing efforts to impose a smoking ban on all town bars, despite the protests of bar owners and customers.

The Board of Health has a moral and legal obligation to protect people from public health hazards, but some people feel that this ban would be an abuse of the board's power.

"To me it simply looks like a group who seems to know what's best for others," said Professor Hans Fisches, a smoker who recently retired from the University of Massachusetts' math department.

Bars were the only exception to Amherst's 1994 ban on smoking in public places. Two years ago, the Amherst Board of Health tabled the issue of preventing smoking in bars to be considered at a later date. Now they are once again considering the ban.

Massachusetts state smoking regulations currently require any location with 75 seats or more to have 200 square feet of non-smoking space, said Bruce Potter, the Massachusetts Restaurant Association's Director of Member Services.

Towns are then able to create their own separate smoking regulations.

According to Potter, Amherst is one of the first towns in the country to attempt to censure smoking from all public places.

Originally, the Amherst Board of Health was one of a number of local community boards, including those of Northampton, Easthampton and Holyoke, which considered imposing such a ban.

None of the other towns are still considering the issue, and many question the Amherst Board of Health's continued push for the ban.

"I've never had any complaints in the two years since the issue was tabled," owner of Delano's Chick Delano said. "Why they're doing this now, I don't know."

Business Concerns

Potter questioned why the Amherst Board of Health is now pushing for the bar ban.

"When all the surrounding communities said no, they kept going," he said. "I don't know why they put their bars in jeopardy."

According to Potter, three other Massachusetts communities, Sharon, Reading and Wakefield, have instituted such a ban, and all are facing problems.

"Three or four bars have gone out of business, and others are having severe problems," he said.

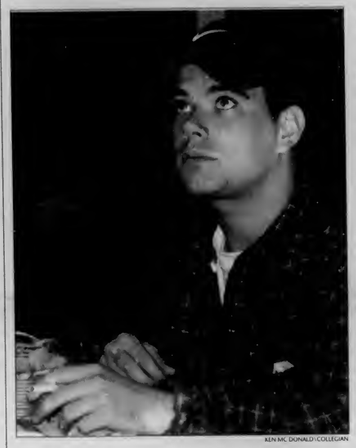
Yet Marlene Leach, the Tobacco Control Coordinator for the Amherst Board of Health, said that the stereotypes of who goes to bars are incorrect.

According to a 1995 Massachusetts Adult Tobacco Survey, about 25 percent of all people ages 18 to 44 smoke.

Leach said that another survey found 75 to 80 percent of people [who go to bars] don't smoke.

Yet many local bar owners disagree with this statistic in regards to their bars.

"Seventy-five percent of my business smokes," said Trudy DiNatale, the owner of Mike's Westview Cafe.



Dave Rohde, manager and bartender of The Spoke, puts the figure closer to 90 percent at the Spoke.

"How many people on the Board of Health go to bars?" he asked. "I think they're out of touch with the scene."

Old Amherst Ale House owner Eugene O'Neil said that many of his customers would either go to Northampton or Hadley or stay home.

Northampton allows smoking in bars, and Hadley currently has no smoking regulations.

"We fear a loss of business because the surrounding towns haven't enacted a no-smoking policy," said Douglas LeBlanc, the owner of The Spoke. "[The ban] would be economically devastating to me."

Netanyahu to continue construction

By Karin Laub
Associated Press

JERUSALEM — Only a day after Israel agreed to consider a "timeout" in Jewish settlement construction, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said yesterday that construction would continue to accommodate natural population growth.

The Palestinians, meanwhile, said peace negotiations cannot resume unless Israel stops all building in the settlements.

"This is the bottom line as far as all Palestinians are concerned," said Palestinian Cabinet minister Hanan Ashrawi.

The tough words cast doubt on whether Israel and the Palestinians can emerge from their deep crisis. A U.S.-brokered agreement reached Monday on the resumption of talks simply deferred sticky issues, such as settlement construction, and fundamental disagreements between the two sides remain.

Asked whether Israel was ready to suspend construction during the negotiations with the Palestinians, as requested by the United States, Netanyahu said: "There is an agreement to discuss the concept of the timeout, and each side will submit its ideas... and you know we are building in the settlements, and making natural growth of the settlements possible, and I don't intend to change our policy."

Netanyahu said he was willing to press ahead with the peace negotiations, but that the Palestinians must first prove that they are committed to crushing Islamic militant groups responsible for more than a dozen suicide-bombings in Israel since 1994.

"This entire process is linked to their fighting terrorism," Netanyahu told reporters. "If they fight terrorism, there will be progress. If they don't fight terrorism, there will not be progress."

Yasser Arafat's security forces have arrested dozens of suspected activists in the Hamas and Islamic militant groups in the past week after Israel delivered proof that two Jerusalem suicide bombings on July 30 and Sept. 4 were

Increase in library's budget; resources will be expanded

By Tomar Carroll
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts W.E.B. DuBois Library will be expanding its resources and staff as a result of Chancellor David K. Scott's budget allocation for fiscal year 1998.

The library received a $300,000 increase in its base funding, as well as a $250,000 one-time allocation, as part of Scott's Strategic Initiatives for fiscal year '98.

Library Director Margo Crist said the additional monies from the budget allocation will be spent in ways directly beneficial to library users.

"Our intention is to focus our expenditures in ways that really advance our resources," Crist said. "The funds will be spent in a manner so users can really feel the benefit."

The increase in the library's base funding, Crist said, will enable new staff to be hired.

"This will let us add some staffing positions," Crist said. "We will fill new positions where the need is."

Crist said staff may be added to help faculty and students learn how to use the library's resources.

"People need some amount of assistance using this array of resources," Crist said. "We would like to get the staff out to work with people in classrooms, too. Faculty are recognizing the need to do that."

The increase in the library's base funding will permit the library to maintain its current subscriptions to paper serials, which have increased in price.

Several full text electronic journals will also be supported through this budget increase. JSTOR (focusing on the Social Sciences), Project News (focusing on the Humanities) and Ideal (focusing on the sciences) are three full text journal services now available on-line through the library.

"Both students and faculty really benefit from having this much information available on-line in full text," Crist said. "We want to continue to provide a mix of what is available electronically and on-line."

The $250,000 one time allocation will be used to improve the physical resources of the library, mainly in terms of increasing the number of computer work stations

Sylvan scavenger hunt benefits Amherst community

By Sarah J. Kimmel
Collegian Staff

If you saw groups of crazed students running around campus last night and wondered who they were, they were residents of Sylvan participating in a campus-wide scavenger hunt.

The hunt, organized by Sylvan Resident Assistants Nicole Garbati, Gregg Berlandi, Clinton Stoller and Renee Wurtzel, was a effort to unify the Sylvan area, help the students to learn the campus and to help their community. Each participant paid an entry fee of one canned food item that will be donated to the Amherst Survival Center. A local supermarket which wishes to remain anonymous has promised to match that donation.

"We heard it would be for a good cause," said Nicci Ledoux, a hunt participant. "We wanted to help out and this is going to be fun."

Participants ran to the Whitmore Administration Building where they were greeted by a clown, former Cashin resident Brian Colby, who gave them a clue. They traveled to the Bluewall where they were forced to eat chicken legs and do the "Macarena" in order to receive a clue. From Antonio's in Southwest to the Green-O Snack Bar, these hunters were on a mission to be the first team to the finish line.

Not only did the clues reveal the next destination the team would travel to, but they also sported different informational blurbs about homelessness and hunger.

"I think that this program is helping the students to learn the campus. It is my hope that everyone will come out of this event having learned something," Wurtzel said.

Gift certificates and coupons were donated or purchased from Media Play, Newbury Comics and

According to John Korpita, owner of the Amherst Brewery, a non-smoking establishment, 90 percent of the people in the bar business probably smoke.

Yet he said that a number of customers thanked him for having a non-smoking establishment.

Potter questioned the demand for non-smoking bars.

"If there was a strong demand for smoke-free bars, then where are they?" he asked. "Owners are with their customers every night, if they saw this as a strong trend, they [would] change."

Some bar owners did not disagree with the aim of the ban, as much as they did with its exclusivity to the area.

"What the bars in town would like is for the Board of Health to wait for the state to enact a policy," LeBlanc said, "so that everyone can play on the same field."

Korpita also agreed that the state should give everyone the same rules to live by.

While many bar owners are concerned about a loss of business, Leach said continued allowance of smoking could have even more of a negative impact on business.

She said that smoking creates liability issues for business owners, and that successful workers' compensation suits in California and Maryland should be a concern to local bar owners.

Enforcement

The question of who will enforce such a ban is unclear.

Amherst police chief Donald Maia said the ban is a health requirement, and health officials must enforce it.

Many bar employees are concerned that they will be left enforcing a ban they don't want.

"If some 230 pound guy sits down and smokes a cigarette, who's gonna stop him?" asked DiNatale.

Other bar employees said that they are busy enough preventing the entrance of minors with fake I.D.'s, monitoring the drinking of patrons, making sure drinks are mixed right, preventing drunk patrons from driving, dealing with fights, and keeping the bar clean and up to code, without also having to worry about smoking.

Another concern of owners is that this ban will make students drive to further destinations, resulting in an increase of drunk driving.

Others have questioned whether the Board of Health can create and enforce such a ban, which Leach assures they have the authority to do.

Protecting public health

The ban is intended to protect customers, bartenders and other bar personnel from inhaling environmental tobacco smoke, Leach said.

Yet most bartenders, who were asked about the issue, said they didn't mind cigarette smoke.

"I knew what I was getting into when I took the job," said Rob Dullea, a non-smoker and bartender at Bursellotti's.

Scott Brascoe, a non-smoker and bartender at the Spoke, said the smoke didn't bother him, and wondered why the Board of Health didn't contact the bar employees to see how they felt.

"I'm an intelligent person, I have the ability to make these decisions for myself," said Rohde. "No one forces someone to work a job."

Leach said that a bartender inhales about one and a half to two packs of cigarettes in one shift. She agrees that people have a choice of workplace, but said that bar employees are an unprotected class of workers.

"Public policy is supposed to be consistent," she said.

According to DiNatale, most bartenders are not exposed to cigarette smoke long enough for it to have a harmful effect on them.

"Bartenders are usually here for two to three years before they move on to their careers," she said.

Leach said that people are casual about smoking cigarettes because they've grown up with it, and that they aren't aware of the threats it poses.

Smokers' rights

Leach said that the ban doesn't mean that people can't smoke — it's just the question of where they can smoke.

"People can still have chewing tobacco at a bar, because you won't expose others to its affects," Valerie Gintis, the coordinator of the Tobacco Free Hampshire County Coalition.

Rohde, a smoker, said that he thinks smokers have been slighted by the Board of Health.

According to Rohde, he has had people close to him die of smoking related reasons, and still believes in the rights of people to smoke.

"The Board of Health doesn't care about the bars or smokers," he said.

Gintis said that if smokers want to harm themselves in their own homes, that was their choice, but when they smoke in bars, it becomes a public concern.

According to one study, more people die from smoking related causes each year than those that die from alcohol, car crashes, AIDS, suicides, homicides, fires and drugs combined, Gintis said.

O'Neil claims that the health effects of cigarette smoke in bars are based on statistics which cannot be proven.

Another concern of the Board of Health is the exposure of children to cigarette smoke.

"Children go into places which call themselves bars, but cater to families," she said.

As a result, families could bring children into what the Board of Health calls a hazardous environment.

Bars that do not allow children are angered that this consideration is being brought up.

"We're an older crowd, we don't allow children, we don't serve food," Rohde said.

available, both on the main floor of the library and through out the tower.

"We would like to expand the number of work stations," Crist said. "We're still working on the issue of getting work stations in the tower. What I am hoping is to have enough terminals so that you would only have to walk up or down one floor."

Currently, computer workstations are available only on the main and seventh floors of the library, so that users on other floors have to take the elevators down or up to get on the library system.

Crist said that she also hopes to increase the number of Netscape workstations available on the main floor.

■ hunt

Bart's Ice Cream. Other prizes include credits toward the UCard and movie passes.

Another twist to this scavenger hunt is that it was not necessary to be first to be a winner. Each person was assigned a personal number and prizes were hidden inside clues which designated a specific number.

No cars were allowed to be used for this hunt so the teams ran in the rain. Even though the bus left from Sylvan five minutes before the hunt began, the students were ready.

"We have walkie talkies, we have bikes... we're psyched," said participant Matt Yezvkeich.

Fellow participant Tyler Gibbs said he was not discouraged by the rain.

"It's just a passing shower," Gibbs said. "It's just El Nino... we came prepared."

The hunt was the brainchild of Garbati who has held events like this before.

"I've done this in the past with friends at home. We did it as a floor war (in Cashin) last year and it was really successful."

Cory Einhorn, Cashin House Council Treasurer was not so enthusiastic about last year's hunt.

"We're not looking forward to doing laps around the TOC," Einhorn said. "That's what they made us do last year."

The Assistant Resident Director of Sylvan, Moise Tirado, is trying to give Sylvan a more positive image. "This is a new identity for the Sylvan Area. We are the city on the hill," Tirado said.

PRINCIPLES of SOUND RETIREMENT INVESTING

EXERCISE REGULARLY AND YOU COULD LIVE LONGER.
INVEST REGULARLY SO YOU CAN AFFORD TO.

Americans are living longer than ever. So it's quite possible you'll spend 20 or 30 years or more in retirement. Can you afford it? Unless you're independently wealthy, chances are you'll need more than your pensions and Social Security to support the kind of lifestyle you'll want.

How can you help ensure that you'll be in good financial shape? Sign up for TIAA-CREF SRAs — tax-deferred annuities available only to people in education and research.

SRAs are easy. No pain, no sweat.

The best way to build strength — physical or fiscal — is to start at a level that's comfortable and add to your regimen as you go along.

With TIAA-CREF SRAs, you conveniently contribute through your employer's payroll system. You can start with a modest amount and increase your contribution as your salary grows.

The important thing is to start now. Delaying for even a year or two can have a big impact on the amount of income you'll have when you retire.

Your contributions are made with pretax dollars, so you pay less tax now. Your earnings are also tax-deferred, so your money can accumulate faster than in a taxable account with the same rate of return. You'll pay taxes on your contributions and earnings only when you receive them as income. There may be some Internal Revenue Code limitations or tax penalties if you withdraw the money before you turn 59½.

SRAs offer you a range of income choices, including lifetime income, payments over a fixed period, or cash. If your employer's plan includes loans, you can borrow against your SRA to meet your other needs.

TIAA-CREF: The Retirement Experts.

TIAA-CREF is the world's largest retirement system, managing approximately $200 billion in assets for more than 1.9 million people. We offer a wide range of SRA allocation choices, long-term investment expertise, and remarkably low expenses.

New cold medicine tested, symptoms are less severe

By Daniel Q. Haney
Associated Press

TORONTO — A cure for the common cold? Not quite. But perhaps the next best thing is on the way: A medicine that helps you feel only half as rotten as you ordinarily would when the sniffles do strike.

Researchers yesterday described the successful human testing of the first medicine that eases cold symptoms by attacking the cold virus itself.

It's still years away from the drugstore, cautioned Dr. Ronald B. Turner.

"We've got a ways to go before we're willing to say the word 'cure.'"

What Turner is willing to say, though, is that a genetically engineered medicine called ICAM-1 clearly seems to make colds less severe if sprayed into the nose around the time of infection. And that's nothing to sneeze at.

Standard cold remedies try to tone down the body's reaction to the cold virus rather than thwart the germ itself. Antiviral approaches have been tried, but they typically do nothing at all or their side effects are worse than the cold.

One obstacle to finding an effective medicine is that so many different bugs cause colds. The most common by far is the rhinovirus, which accounts for about 40 percent of them. But there are more than 100 different strains of rhinovirus.

A few years ago, scientists learned how almost all the rhinoviruses get into the body. They attach themselves to a particular protein on the cells of the nasal lining. Scientists call this protein "intracellular adhesion molecule-1," or ICAM-1. Using gene splicing, scientists can produce ICAM-1 in volume. The idea behind the new treatment is to spray it into the nose, where it serves as a sort of decoy, luring cold viruses away from their real target.

"Molecular bait," some call it.

Two pharmaceutical companies — Bayer Corp. and Boehringer Ingelheim Pharmaceuticals — are developing this approach.

Turner, an expert on colds at the Medical University of South Carolina in Charleston, said Boehringer's medicine is the first to make it into human testing. He presented the results of that experiment, financed by Boehringer, at a meeting of the American Society for Microbiology.

The researchers sprayed ICAM-1 or dummy medicines into the noses of 177 volunteers either seven hours before or 12 hours after exposing them to rhinovirus.

The spray did not keep them from getting infected. But it reduced the severity of their cold symptoms by about 50 percent. By comparison, antihistamines — the mainstay of over-the-counter remedies — reduce symptoms by about a third.

The researchers asked people to rate their misery, going down a check list of stuffiness, cough, headache and sore throat, among others. On every item, the people getting ICAM-1 felt better. They also compared "nasal mucous weight," as they delicately put it, and found a 55 percent reduction.

"It looks very promising, but whether it will prove to be cost effective and feasible is another matter," commented Dr. W. Michael Scheld of the University of Virginia.

Clinton promises IRS improvements; Gingrich vocalizes criticism

By Terence Hunt
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Shaken by stories of IRS abuse, the Clinton administration scrambled yesterday to relieve taxpayer anxieties and prevent Republicans from capitalizing on an easy target. President Clinton promised improvements but said, "We should not politicize it."

House Speaker Newt Gingrich responded with a verbal shot at Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin, saying Rubin's attendance at financial meetings overseas last week during the Senate's tax hearings showed he was "too busy to administer the IRS."

From Congress to the White House to the Treasury Department, the charges and countercharges grew hotter. Clinton was left in the difficult position of defending an unpopular agency and promising to make it better — while rejecting a bipartisan proposal for a citizen oversight board.

Questioning Clinton's priorities, Gingrich said the IRS — "so badly managed" — had 10 times more staff than government agencies battling illegal drugs or immigration problems.

COURTESY/ASSOCIATED PRESS
President Bill Clinton

But Clinton said, "I believe the IRS is functioning better today than it was five years ago. I think it has to improve more. And I think we should not try to sweep any of these problems under the rugs."

Rubin, in a news conference following Gingrich's attack, defended his oversight of the tax-collection agency. He also announced the IRS would start conducting "problem solving days" at offices across the country to help taxpayers.

Rubin said the Clinton administration had moved to boost customer service with an improved system to file taxes by touch-tone telephone and better responses on the agency's toll-free tax help line.

He also sought to put stories of IRS misconduct in context of mistakes made within an organization of 102,000 workers who collect $1.5 trillion annually.

"No matter how well it's run and how careful everything is done, inevitably, every year, there will be some number of instances that are not handled properly," Rubin said. "The key is to minimize it."

At the White House, presidential spokesman Mike McCurry criticized Gingrich in unusually harsh terms. McCurry said the speaker "is probably one institution in American political life less popular than the IRS." McCurry added, "In fact, the more he's out there, the better it is in the long run for us."

He said Gingrich's call to "abolish the IRS as we know it" was nothing more than a slogan, far from "the hard work of changing that agency" and improving its performance.

Gingrich's spokeswoman, Christina Martin, fired back at McCurry: "I'd be a little grouchy too if I had to defend a privacy-invading, citizen-terrorizing, property-seizing bureaucratic monster like the IRS."

A week after the Senate hearings on IRS misconduct, all sides agree that the agency needs reforms but there is a sharp disagreement over who should oversee it.

A bipartisan group headed by Sen. Bob Kerrey (D-Neb.) and Rep. Rob Portman, (R-Ohio), has called for a nine-member oversight board of private citizens to develop the IRS budget and long-term planning. This bill enjoys bipartisan support in the House and Senate and is being championed by House Republicans as the main IRS restructuring proposal.

The Treasury Department, in contrast, wants an oversight board of executive branch officials. Republicans oppose the administration plan as putting potential political influence over the agency.

"I think that the president is protecting Treasury's turf here at a time when the turf battle is inappropriate," Portman said in an interview. "Rather we should be focused on root causes with the IRS — poor oversight and lack of management."

GOP attempts to influence summit

By Slobodan Lekic
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A House panel voted yesterday to bar Chinese officials who commit human rights violations from visiting the United States.

"We don't want the ghouls of the world to come here," said Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, (R-Calif.), one of the co-sponsors.

Earlier yesterday, the House urged the Clinton administration to supply Taiwan with the latest theater antiballistic missile system, if the government in Taiwan requests it.

"The only point we want to send to Beijing is: You mess around and we'll put some missiles in your back yard," said Rep. Donald Manzullo (R-Ill).

Combined with measures passed Monday and Friday, the legislation is part of an attempt by GOP conservatives to influence the agenda of the upcoming summit between President Clinton and Chinese President Jiang Zemin.

"The cumulative effect of these bills does a number of things: It points us in the direction of cutting off dialogue with China, in the direction of disengagement from China, in the direction of making China the enemy," said Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana, the ranking Democrat on the International Relations Committee. The visa bill also would exclude from admission into the United States leaders of China's government-sanctioned religious organizations. These include Buddhist, Taoist, Catholic, Protestant and Islamic groups.

It is strongly opposed by the administration, which has said China could retaliate by denying visas to many Americans, including missionaries.

"We will end up with the Chinese government banning evangelists and others who now have visas to go and operate within China," said Rep. Sam Gejdenson, (D-Conn).

State Department representatives opposed the nonbinding resolution to supply anti-missile systems to Taiwan, arguing that it was premature. The United States already has sold Taipei the latest version of the Patriot missiles used in the Gulf War. Taiwan requested that weapon after China test-fired missiles into waters near the island in 1995 and 1996. China claims Taiwan as a renegade province. But Taipei has not asked for an upgraded version of the missile, which is still on the drawing boards.

carried out by assailants from the West Bank.

Yesterday, Palestinian police arrested eight Hamas activists in the West Bank town of Ramallah, including members of the group's military wing, Izzedine al Qassam, a Palestinian security official said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Under the agreement reached in New York on Monday, Israeli and Palestinian negotiators will meet in the Middle East in a week to discuss the implementation of outstanding issues in the interim peace accords, such as the opening of a Palestinian airport and of a safe passage between the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

In a meeting in mid-October in the United States, the two sides are to discuss the proposed timeout in settlement construction and Israel's long-overdue troop pullback from large areas of the West Bank. Also on the agenda is a starting date for talks on a permanent peace agreement.

In another development today, the Israeli daily Haaretz said Israeli security forces have identified the mastermind of two bombings by the Islamic militant group Hamas in Jerusalem on July 30 and Sept. 4.

The bombmaker was identified as Adel Awadallah, a resident of the West Bank town of Ramallah and now a fugitive. But an Israeli official said the go-ahead for the attacks came from Islamic militant leaders in Syria.

The assessment marked the first time Israel mentioned a foreign involvement in the bombings. But Israeli government spokesman Moshe Fogel said the new disclosures did not diminish PLO leader Yasser Arafat's responsibility.

The easy way out?

Hey, have you all heard? Ted Turner (almost as rich as Bill Gates) has just made a commitment to fork over $1 billion to causes supported by the United Nations.

Now, take a deep breath and just think about that. One billion dollars. Some of us could work till the year 5724 and not make that much money.

But here he is, Ted Turner, giving the U.N. the largest private donation from an individual. Best of all, Turner gets very little say in how the money will be spent. So all of you concerned about Turner running the U.N. can relax.

"It must be really nice to have your own television network so you can tell the rest of the world what a nice guy you are."

Seema Gangatirkar

Of course the U.N. won't get all the money in a lump sum. No earthly bank would be able to process a check that big. The gift will be broken up into $100 million over 10 years and will go towards programs in developing countries.

I guess $1 billion is pocket change to Turner — this is a guy who makes somewhere in the neighborhood of $5.2 billion a year.

But it's not just a case of getting rid of loose change for Turner. This guy really wants to make a difference. He says he was inspired by the work of Mother Teresa and Princess Diana and that he would like to help in some way.

Well, don't say Turner has no gumption. He really knows how to get everyone's attention.

For example, Turner even got on "Larry King Live" — which, you guessed it, runs on his CNN network — to tell us how the money is going to be spent and how his wife Jane Fonda wept over the news.

It's hard to imagine Fonda weeping with joy over the donation — this is a woman with a 300-square-foot closet.

But back to Turner and his pal, Larry King. It must be really nice to have your own television network so you can tell the rest of the world what a nice guy you are. If that isn't self-promotion, then I don't know what is.

But whatever personal feelings about Turner may be, his gift was given generously and will go to help a lot of people. But recall his motivation for shelling out the big bucks — Mother Teresa and Princess Diana.

If you take a second to think about these two remarkable women, you realize that they were completely different. Mother Teresa came from a small village in Albania, while Diana hailed from the upper-crust of English society.

Diana owned hundreds of pieces of clothing and was wealthy. Mother Teresa owned three saris and had little personal wealth. Diana was young, Mother Teresa was old — the differences are endless.

But one thing Mother Teresa and Diana shared was a concern for those less fortunate.

Back in the '80s, when everyone was afraid of AIDS, Diana went and touched and hugged people with AIDS. Just last year, Diana walked through a mine-field in Angola to strengthen her point that land mines ought to be banned.

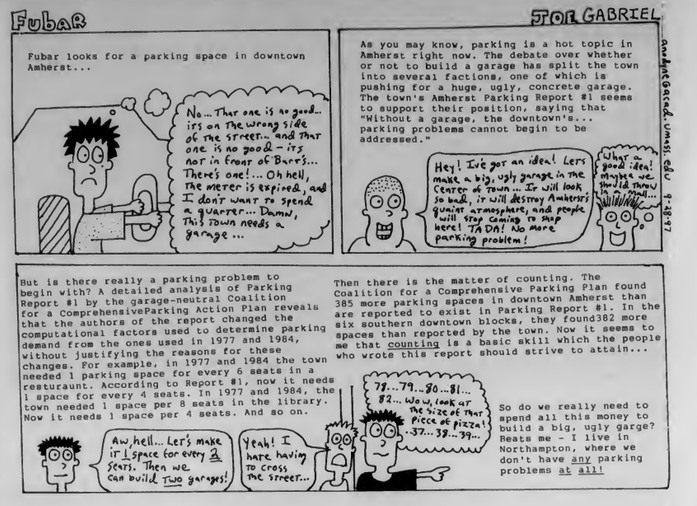
Mother Teresa lived in Calcutta, with the poorest of the poor. She took care of the sick and the hungry, and comforted the dying.

Princess Diana had plenty of money and she could have taken the easy way out by just giving money to charity. Instead, she went out and physically hugged and touched people. Her actions spoke louder than her purse ever could.

For Mother Teresa, a different standard applies. Yet for 50 years, even in failing health, she never gave up. She continued to work and travel, even when it might have been so easy to retire.

Their example will be hard to follow and in no way should we belittle Turner's gift. His contribution will help build schools, pave roads, improve hospitals and provide food for people all over the world. In fact, Turner's actions should be a catalyst for more people to take a moment to help others.

However, the lesson left behind by two exceptional women should not be forgotten.



Money, as the adage says so eloquently, does not buy love. Nothing heals more than a touch, and sometimes all the money in the world cannot equal the comfort that comes from a hug.

Willing to fight

If you believe in a cause, then your will must motivate your actions to help and benefit that cause. If you disagree with domestic violence, then you must be willing to stop it; you must be willing to unselfishly devote yourself to the fight against it. If you are audacious enough to say domestic violence should end, then your volition and voice should be as audacious to end it.

When witnessing domestic violence, many people get nervous, physically freeze and become silent. In many of these cases, silence and lack of action allow the situation to escalate and become more injurious or harmful.

At a bus station in Roma, Italy, I witnessed a young woman being beaten by her young boyfriend. The streets were desolate, causing the dust that usually follows feet in their daily hustle through town to settle on a still and calm concrete ground. There was less noise being produced there, that night, than here in Amherst on a Tuesday evening. Although there were about 15 people in a 20-foot radius surrounding the scene, not one person besides myself responded to the situation.

As this young man punched, kicked and pulled the hair of his girlfriend, my instincts lead me to stand and scream. A group of on-duty bus drivers who looked like "mature," "moral" professionals (smoking their cigarettes) were asked to call the police. After hearing this request, they turned and failed to fulfill it. Most people seem to not care or not deal with situations outside of their own. The bus drivers exemplified this apathy by saying and doing nothing. Although the man eventually stopped beating his girlfriend, the lack of concern by the bus drivers baffled me. Because they were the oldest people there, they could have stopped the violence faster than one girl screaming.

Amongst 15 people, I was the only one who opened my mouth to stop what was happening and say it was wrong. Can you believe that? Imagine someone attacking you, beating your head, screaming at you, pulling your hair, and not one person around offers their help because they might not know you, or even, they might not care. If this is true, then we live in a very scary world.

If you are unsure of how to react to domestic violence, here are some helpful tips on 'safe,' 'pacific,' and 'standard' responses you can have: Consult both the abuser and the abused. Help them to a counselor, group (Battery Intervention) or hot line. Explain to the abuser that he/she can not behave in such a manner, and support the abused as she/he frees her/himself from the situation at hand. Call the police, or ask someone nearby to do so. Be sure to present options that the victim of domestic violence can consider. Many victims are afraid to leave, confront, recognize or protest themselves from their perpetrator. With support and a variety of options, you can help a victim deal with or get out of a violent and hurtful situation.

It is also important to challenge people who have been misguided to believe certain myths surrounding domestic violence: victims ask for it, it happens to certain people, etc. By providing information on domestic violence, ignorance will diminish, and soon after, domestic violence should too. Community education can be obtained at any resource or help center, including The Everywoman's Center, found here at UMass, towards the central area of campus.

We must protect ourselves from the abuse we may receive, as well as protecting those around us. We can not say we hate domestic violence and then ignore it when it is in front of our faces. You too may witness what I did this summer, and it will be your voice, your actions and your intelligence that show the world exactly how you feel, and exactly what you believe.

If you are strong enough to hold a belief, strong enough to disagree with a certain behavior, then you must be able to back that up with a voice, a volition and an endurance that will not fail or freeze over when your eyes are in shock with what you see. I would smile more often, but I can't smile at violence, nor the permanent pain and misery it produces.

Ombudsperson didn't breach ethics

To the Editor:

I have recently been subjected to a series of criticisms regarding my performance as University Ombudsperson, referenced for example in two recent Collegian articles. To this point, I have not been consulted by any of my critics (or the Collegian) as to my opinions on a specific matter under discussion — my statement to the Massachusetts Advisory Committee to the United States Civil Rights Commissions last April 25. Perhaps the Collegian will allow me a few words in response.

The ombuds role is extremely complex, to the point where it is probably (appropriately) inconsistent when all of its features are laid out at once. Among ombudspersons, there is a healthy variety of opinions about how ombudspersons should conduct themselves and a variety of ombudspersons organizations, codes of ethics, etc. My critics have chosen one code of ethics and elaborated and misinterpreted a portion of its meaning. The simple fact is that some ombudspersons would have done what I did and considered it within the parameters of the profession, and others would have not. I did it, right out there in public, and there was ample opportunity for student rebuttal when students spoke after my statement.

One thread of the criticism is that I violated confidences in my statement. For example, it has been said that I violated administration confidentiality in stating that the administration had accepted the negotiator proposed by the students. This was very public knowledge at the time, and was announced, for example, at a public meeting before I read my statement. The intent of the code of ethics is to shield private and confidential conversations between an ombudsperson and a client from public view. Not every conversation with an ombudsperson is such, and I did not participate in any relevant private ombuds conversations with any of the Goodell participants. I also made no reference to any of the discussions inside Goodell whose content was agreed to be confidential by the participants (as witnessed by this observer). The provisions of the code of ethics cites simply do not connect with my April 25 statement.

I am slightly mystified by the accusation that I offered my own opinions in my statement. That is precisely right. That is what I had agreed to do with the Commission. Of course it would be the case that other Goodell participants would have other opinions, many of them conflicting with mine. I am even more mystified by the suggestion that an ombudsperson shouldn't have opinions and should never make judgements. This is where my critics have, in my opinion, a rather one-dimensional view of ombuds work. It would also be impossible to struggle for fairness and justice (with which ombuds are also charged) without any opinions or judgements, the mere perception of an unfairness to be addressed requiring that some judgement have already been made.

I can't remember being repeatedly asked by students in advance of seeing my statement not to participate on April 25. The point is moot. I would have read my statement (having agreed to do so) if I had been repeatedly asked not to. I have tried on occasion to explain that if it got around that students (or anyone else) could determine what I did, that my effectiveness as an ombudsperson would no longer exist. Independence is also required of ombudspersons.

I admit to being distressed by these repetitive attacks. I can't really defend myself against them in detail. This is one incident in a year and a half of hard work as University Ombudsperson. I am sure vanity led me astray when I thought that I had built up a reservoir of good will in certain quarters against displeasure over a single assessment of my tenure in the University Ombudspersons role would depend on the hundreds of specific situations that are the central thread in my work. Here I think I have done a good job, but my critics are no doubt aware that I can't discuss that without really violating confidentiality, which I will not do.

Mount Holyoke exhibit analyzes architecture

By Jeff Hnatio
Collegian Correspondent

The importance of architecture and design in a museum is often overlooked, and a new exhibit at Mount Holyoke College Art Museum examines this subject.

The exhibition entitled, How To Remember? Designing The United States Holocaust Museum, displays photos, architectural drawings, site plans and sketches of the museum by architect James Ingo Freed.

Freed had a number of important goals for the museum design. The museum had to be similar in style to other official buildings in Washington D.C., yet transport the visitor out of the city and into a unique place, said Marianne Doezema, the museum's director.

A large scale model of the museum and its surroundings is located in the center of the exhibit. Most of the exterior of the Holocaust Memorial is white limestone, which is a common style in Washington. However, the exhibit shows that much of the interior design of the building includes brick and metal.

The museum was designed to become "a resonator of memory," Freed said.

A number of sketches from the exhibit reveal how the architecture of concentration camps was incorporated into the Museum's design. One sketch includes a drawing of a concentration camp watchtower next to a very similar drawing of a tower from the museum.

Other sketches contain drawings of the brick walls and metal trusses from the interior of the museum. "The brick walls, exposed beams, boarded windows and metal fences... will let visitors know that they are in a different place — the Holocaust is an event that should disturb and be felt, in a visceral way, as well as perceived," Freed said.

"I think it is a very powerful exhibit in demonstrating how much planning and detail went into constructing a memorial that would truly ensure that the Holocaust is never forgotten," said Katherine Dorsey, a sophomore history major at Mount Holyoke College.

The exhibition is open Tues-Fri 11 a.m.-5 p.m. and Sat-Sun 1 p.m.-5 p.m. and runs through Dec. 14.

Catholic Church apologizes for silence during Holocaust

DRANCY, France — (AP) In an unprecedented act of repentance, France's Roman Catholic Church apologized yesterday for its silence during the systematic persecution and deportation of Jews by the pro-Nazi Vichy regime.

More than 1,000 Jews and Christians gathered for the emotional ceremony on the grounds of Drancy, the transit camp outside Paris where Jews languished in squalid conditions before being shipped to Auschwitz.

Standing in front of a sealed cattle car like the ones used to transport Jews to their deaths, Bishop Olivier de Berranger read from a statement atoning for the silence of the church and its clergy from 1940-1942.

"We beg God's forgiveness and ask the Jewish people to hear our words of repentance," said Berranger, the bishop of Saint-Denis, which includes the town of Drancy.

"We recognize that the church of France failed in its mission to educate consciences and thus bears the responsibility of not having offered help immediately, when protest and protection were possible and necessary, even if there were countless acts of courage later on," Berranger said. "We confess this mistake." The timing of the apology was significant — it came one week before the trial of Maurice Papon, the highest-ranking Vichy official ever tried on charges of complicity in crimes against humanity.

A former police supervisor in Bordeaux, Papon is charged with signing arrest orders that led to the deportation of 1,690 Jews, including 223 children. His trial is expected to shed light on the role of the French administration in the Holocaust.

Jewish leaders at the ceremony were visibly moved.

"Your words of repentance constitute a major turning point," said Henri Hajdenberg, president of the Representative Council of Jewish Institutions. "Your request for forgiveness is so intense, so powerful, so poignant, that it can't but be heard by the surviving victims and their children."

Also at the ceremony was Cardinal Jean-Marie Lustiger, the Jewish-born archbishop of Paris, whose mother was deported through Drancy and died at Auschwitz.

The apology came 57 years after the so-called anti-Jewish laws were passed in October 1940 — four months after Vichy leader Marshal Philippe Petain took power and dissolved the parliament. The discriminatory measures were stricter than those already in effect in Germany, and banned Jews from the major professions, such as law, medicine, teaching and civil service.

They also prohibited Jews from owning property, kept their children out of public parks, required them to ride in the last subway car and later forced them to wear a yellow star of David. And they allowed Vichy officials to carry out detailed censuses of the Jewish population and its assets, making it easier for police to track them down for deportation.

About 76,000 Jews, including 12,000 children, were deported from France between 1941-44. Only about 2,500 survived.

Tuesday's apology followed Pope John Paul II's call in November 1994 for the church to own up to the sins of Roman Catholics as it approaches the third millennium. The pope said nothing specific about World War II or the Holocaust, but he has often spoken of the suffering of Jews under the Nazis.

Both the Vatican and John Paul have defended Pope Pius XII, the pope from 1939-1958, against charges he remained silent or did not do enough to prevent the Holocaust.

Historians have repeatedly asserted that the French Catholic Church's indifference to the anti-Jewish laws allowed existing anti-Semitic sentiment to flourish.

The relationship between the church and the Vichy regime was complex. In the war's early days, all but five or six of the nation's 76 bishops embraced Petain's National Revolution, which promised a return to the family, spiritual and moral values espoused by the church.

Under Vichy, religious instruction — outlawed since the separation of church and state in 1905 — was revived in public schools.

But the mass deportations of 1942 brought a change of heart among the French Catholic clergy.

In August 1942, the Most Rev. Jules Geraud Saliege, archbishop of Toulouse, delivered a blunt sermon condemning the inhumane treatment of Jews.

"Jews are men, Jews are women... They must be treated with decency. These fathers and mothers," Saliege said in a statement read from pulpits across France. "They are part of the human race. They are our brothers, like so many others. A Christian cannot forget it."

Fearful of a popular backlash, the Vichy regime slowed the pace of raids and deportations.

The Drancy camp — known as "the antechamber of death" — was opened in 1939, initially to house communists and prisoners of war. Thousands of Jewish children, elderly and the sick died there, victims of scarce food and virtually nonexistent hygiene.

Today, the former prison buildings are painted pink and beige, and used as low-income housing, mainly for immigrants. Many residents cleaned out windows yesterday, listening to the ceremony. The cattle car, placed as a memorial in the middle of a park, bears a plaque saying 100,000 Jews passed through Drancy, but only a few hundred returned.

The meaning of Rosh Hashanah

What is Rosh Hashanah?
Rosh Hashanah, along with Yom Kippur, are the High Holidays, the most contemplative and important days on the Jewish calendar. Rosh Hashanah signifies the beginning of the 10 day period when Jews are to carefully examine their deeds and their misdeeds of the past year.

This year, Rosh Hashanah begins on the night of Oct. 1 and is traditionally celebrated over two days and two nights. Rosh Hashanah is a time filled with great tradition and symbols. The Shofar, apples and honey are the three quintessential symbols of the holiday.

The Shofar is a ram's horn that is used as an instrument during prayer services. It is blown several times on each of the two days of Rosh Hashanah. It is suggested that the blowing of the Shofar is to awaken our thoughts to remind us of our conduct over the past year.

Rosh Hashanah is a holy time for the Jewish people. Most Jews on this holiday practice what they call Tashikh. This the practice of going to a flowing body of water (at the University of Massachusetts, it is the campus pond) acts as a way to cast out sins by throwing bread crumbs into the water. This is usually done on the first full afternoon of Rosh Hashanah.

Rachel Kristol & Jaclyn Sobel

The time when Rosh Hashanah ends to the time when Yom Kippur begins is called the "Ten Days of Atonement." During this time, what Jews call "The Book of Life" is open. G-d is taking the time to write down every Jews' year to come. The Jews are then "inscribed" into the book of life on Yom Kippur, on which the book is closed.

Have a sweet and Happy New Year! L'Shanah Tova to one and all!

Celebrating the New Year

Tonight, as the sun sets, the world's Jewish community will sound their shofars to celebrate the coming of a new year. The holiday of Rosh Hashannah, the Jewish New Year, is a time of new beginnings and the chance for a fresh start. According to the Jewish Lunar calendar, tonight will begin the year 5758, and with it comes a past of rich tradition and a future of resolutions.

Rosh Hashannah is the first of a group of holidays known collectively as the High Holy Days. These holidays include the Jewish New Year, Yom Kippur (the day of atonement), and Sukkot (a celebration of the harvest and growing things). Rosh Hashannah, like all Jewish holidays based on the lunar calendar, begins in the evening, following sunset.

In addition to religious services held in synagogues worldwide, the holiday is celebrated with rituals full of symbolism and meaning. Apples dipped in honey, and round, raisin-filled challahs are eaten in order to make the new year sweet. The ceremony of tashlich, the casting of bread upon the water, allows an individual to use crumbs as symbols of past sin, and then throw them into a moving body of water, thereby ridding themselves of regrets from the passing year and starting again with a clean slate. The blowing of the shofar, an instrument made from a ram's horn, calls the community to prayer and sounds their celebration. Grand meals are eaten, families and friends come together, and resolutions for the coming year are made.

One of the questions that surrounds Rosh Hashannah lies in whether the holiday is supposed to be celebrated for one or two days. The confusion comes from the days of the Diaspora, when the Jews left Israel and made their homes all over the world.

Debra Liebson

At that time, the holiday was only observed for a single day, but those who lived far from Israel couldn't be sure that the setting and rising of the sun they saw corresponded to that in Israel. So the tradition of lengthening the observance to two days began, with people believing that within the two days they could be sure they were celebrating within the correct time-frame. Today, the tradition of celebrating two days continues, although many congregations have decided to return to the single day of observance.

As we sound the shofar tonight, the year 5758 holds a special significance, as the 50th anniversary of the State of Israel takes place this year. It promises to be a year of celebration and joy for the Jewish community around the world. L'shanah Tova, have a happy new year, and may it be a sweet one.

Israel will not extradite teen suspect for Maryland murder

By Dafna Linzer
Associated Press

TEL AVIV, Israel — Turning down an extradition request by the United States, Israel said yesterday it will try a Maryland teen-ager charged in the death of an acquaintance whose body was burned and dismembered.

The suspect, Samuel Sheinbein, 17, from Wheaton, Md., fled to Israel last week. His father, Shlomo, a lawyer and former Pentagon employee, has been charged in Israel with tampering with a police investigation by helping his son flee the United States.

A brother, Robert, checked Sheinbein into a psychiatric hospital in Israel last week after finding he had suffered a drug overdose. Sheinbein's father and brother were detained by Israeli police on Monday, but were released yesterday on condition they remain in Israel, said police spokeswoman Linda Menuhin.

Sheinbein and an alleged accomplice, Aaron Benjamin Needle, have been charged in Maryland's Montgomery County Court with murdering 19-year-old Alfredo Enrique Tello, Jr. A real estate agent found Tello's charred remains Sept. 18 inside a home she was going to show.

Israeli Justice Ministry spokeswoman Orit Shemesh said Israeli police would handle the case and that Sheinbein would not be sent back to the United States.

"An investigation has been opened to put him on trial here. He cannot be extradited. He was an Israeli citizen when the crime was committed," she said.

Sheinbein has never lived in Israel. His father, however, is an Israeli citizen so Sheinbein is automatically considered a citizen. U.S. authorities requested Sheinbein's arrest and extradition after he surfaced in Israel last week.

Maryland has the death penalty, but Sheinbein would not have faced execution if tried in the United States because he is a minor.

Israel has rejected a U.S. extradition request before in a similar case, the 1987 murder of California couple, Jack and Carmen Haliby. Two Israeli youths charged in the murder fled to Israel and were arrested by police here. In 1991, an Israeli court sentenced each of them to life in prison for the killings.

On Monday, Sheinbein appeared before a magistrate who ordered him held for 10 more days so police can question him. Sheinbein later refused to speak to reporters.

Sheinbein's attorney, Nitzana Lietner, told the judge that Sheinbein "committed a criminal offense in self defense." Lietner said her client had come to Israel because he wanted to be tried here rather that in the United States.

Note from the Editor:
I'm happy to say this is the second page of the semester, but there is so much left to do. I need new writers to adequately cover the events through out the Five College community, as well as to help create a discourse on various issues surrounding Jewish identity. Another one of the aims of this desk is to examine the constant events in the Middle East and Israel and how they relate to American Jews.
This desk does not wish to make choices for individuals, but seeks to provide information which will help people make choices.

VARIOUS ARTISTS
Pure Dance 1998
Polygram Records

Whether it's a heavy-metal thrash or country-ish twang, an album is successful only if a combination of many things come together over its course. When one particular song runs against the grain of the rest of an album, the entire work suffers. It's this inconsistency between songs that plagues Pure Dance 1998 (Polygram).

Pure Dance 1998 tries to sell itself as a collection of top dance hits, mixed together flawlessly to blend into one incredible (and continuous) dance experience. While the songs do blend into one another well, some clearly do not fit the general mood of the album. Pure Dance 1998 is trying to combine two albums in one, a concept that doesn't quite work.

While most of the songs are excellent in their own right (regardless of whether they fit on the album), some formerly respectable songs have been mangled by ridiculous mixing. U2's "Discotheque" survives relatively unscathed, although it's a bit tame compared with the rest of Pure Dance 1998. "Mofo," an angrier number off their Pop album, would have been a better choice. The same cannot be said of "How Bizarre" — an original and refreshing tune from the New Zealand group OMC — which has been stretched out into absurdity, becoming painfully monotonous after a few minutes.

The bottom line is that for a 17-track album, Pure Dance 1998 is about 7 tracks too long. It's not that the album lacks strengths, it simply has too many distracting, poorly mixed or just plain boring songs. B- (Brian Surette)

JEREMY TOBACK
Perfect Flux Thing
RCA

Jeremy Toback began by playing small venues like L.A. coffeehouses, and eventually moved on to play bass for Brad — the side project of Pearl Jam's Stone Gossard. Now, after a stint playing at this summer's Lollapalooza, Jeremy Toback is writing, singing and performing his own songs of his lyrically beautiful and artistically competent album, Perfect Flux Thing (RCA).

Toback's music has a mellow, soothing sound. His most memorable songs include "Blood White Gold," "Eden Trampoline" and "The Word Behind Words." These songs each reveal Toback's truly sophisticated and poetic writing style. At times, the subtle quiver in his voice is reminiscent of Neil Young and even Eddie Vedder.

Perfect Flux Thing combines such musical styles as folk, pop, rock and jazz into one very strong album. One thing for sure, Jeremy Toback is a welcome talent who has a lot of musical energy and inventiveness to offer. B+ (Christina Morais)

SHIFT Get In Columbia

Like their New York City neighbors in Helmet, Shift take a simplistic approach to rock 'n roll. On Get In (Columbia), the result is a no-frills, hard-hitting attack, but with a twist. Songwriter Joshua Loucka has a knack for catchy songwriting that allows his pop-conscious melodies to linger in the listener just long enough to make them memorable. Not easy for a guy who emerged from the burgeoning NYC punk/hardcore scene where the above traits are about as common as the Red Sox winning the World Series.

While the rhythm section of drummer Samantha Maloney and bassist Brandon Simpson could use a little tightening and Loucka's lyrics often seem to trail off into pointless proclamations — "I think I like the sound of fame," off "I Want To Be Rich" being one example — Get In is nonetheless a solid effort. B- (M.K.)

Trax On Trax Off

On their latest, England's Spiritualized truly are floating in space — as the title suggests. Unquestionably, songwriter Jason Pierce's musical vision is more than a little out in the stratosphere. Thankfully however, it makes for some ambitious sonic excursions that are both poignant and startling.

What Pierce lacks in saneness and common sensibility, he more than makes up for in his songs, which reflect his avant-garde persona. Ladies And Gentlemen... (Dedicated/Arista) works mostly as a vehicle for his profound musical awareness utilizing a full gospel choir, '70s Elvis-style Memphis horn arrangements and a string quartet at various points. Call it '90s soul, British style.

A daring (not to mention daunting) proposition to say the least, but somehow it all comes together quite magically. A (Marty Keane)

What do you get when you pair a singer/songwriter and guitarist (Jason Narducy) with a university-trained cellist (Alison Chesly)? The answer can be found on Chronicles (550 Music/Epic), the stellar debut album from the eclectic Chicago quartet Verbow.

Chronicles deftly mixes a blend of Sugar-y guitar rock and acoustic melodicism. While Narducy's emotional introspection dominates much of the lyrical content, Chronicles never crosses over into self-pity. Thanks in no small part to Bob Mould's trademark clean, crisp production, Verbow execute their aural feast with an almost alarming sense of purpose.

Three years ago, it was hard to imagine that director Steven Spielberg could top himself. His film Jurassic Park had quickly become the biggest of all blockbusters, and Schindler's List brought a slew of Oscars to Spielberg's mantlepiece. However, the legendary filmmaker was hardly ready to slow down. Instead, he went full speed ahead with his most ambitious project to date — the creation of a new studio. Along with former Disney executive Jeffrey Katzenberg and music mogul David Geffen, Spielberg founded DreamWorks SKG, an independent company focusing on cost-efficient entertainment, if that's possible in Hollywood.

Now, after mixed results in music and television, DreamWorks Pictures is finally ready to be revealed. Its first release is nothing too original or special, rather an efficient action thriller starring two of today's best looking actors. George Clooney, attempting a shot at redemption after the dreadful Batman and Robin, along with Nicole Kidman, provide the necessary glamour and charisma to keep The Peacemaker from losing itself in its complicated, often gloomy plot.

A number of clever genre twists help as well. Half way through the film, a car chase takes place through the streets of Vienna, and although the car chase may be the biggest cliché of action movies, director Mimi Leder knows how to make things interesting. Let's just say that it involves a demolition derby and a really tough Mercedes.

Beginning in Russia with a devastating nuclear blast killing 1,500 people, the film then tracks an attempt to steal ten nuclear weapons, which were originally destined to be disarmed. "I'm not afraid of the man who wants ten nuclear weapons," Kidman says to Clooney early in the film. "I'm terrified of the man who only wants one."

The movie smartly plays upon this paranoia, and through various locations including Vienna, Bosnia and France, Special Forces agent Clooney and White House Smuggling Group head Kidman, team together to stop the truck carrying the bombs. The two are a perfect cinematic match — Clooney is perfectly cast as the reckless warrior, and Kidman holds her own as the icy, serious scholar-type. While their relationship could have been played out to a better effect, it nonetheless provides the film with necessary comic relief, all the while both stars manage to always look their best throughout the picture.

It's three set pieces, though, that really hold The Peacemaker together — the slick Vienna car chase, a helicopter siege on the bomb-bearing truck, and a lavish Manhattan shoot-out that's worth the price of admission (well, Amherst admission, that is) alone. The film is at its best when the director relies on her strong visual sense. In fact, the first 20 minutes of the movie contain no English- spoken dialogue at all, and much of Michael Schiffer's script is filled with military jargon and shouted commands. Luckily, Spielberg has found quite a talent in Leder. The winner of two Emmys for directing "ER.," Leder possesses an uncanny knack for logistics and crowd control, most evident in the riveting Manhattan climax.

The Peacemaker can best be compared to a Tom Clancy vehicle, such as Clear and Present Danger, as it relies on complicated, striking set pieces and big ideas to draw in the audience. The picture also features a few more welcome hooks — dazzling second-unit direction, rich photography, and a pumped up music score from action veteran Hans Zimmer (Crimson Tide). Also look for a few inside jokes including a reference to a certain "Baywatch" star.

If the desire to make the film a realistic military adventure has its advantages, there are also some inherent disadvantages. The movie's breathtaking speed leaves little room for character development, a Clooney-Kidman romance or much viewer thought. It's a by-the-numbers [the book?] action adventure. Perhaps DreamWorks' next feature will stretch the mind a bit more. The Spielberg-directed Amistad, about a slave mutiny in the 1800s, is set to be released just in time for Oscar consideration. In the meantime, however, The Peacemaker is a solid, safe debut from three of the richest guys in America. So you might as well just add your $3.50. B-

A commentary on "ER" live

ER
NBC
Thursdays, 10 p.m.

Ladies and gentlemen... LIVE, from NBC studios in Burbank, CA. it's "ER." Huh? The question arose a few times throughout last Thursday night on whether the show was actually being filmed live or not. If you would happen to look up the definition of chaos in the dictionary, you might just find: chaos — see "ER" (live on Sept. 25, 1997).

The truth is "ER"'s live debut wasn't the chaotic destruction you would expect if let us say "Chicago Hope" attempted to strive into the live format. There was a certain elegance and a fresh new tone which overcame the revered show — its mastery of the stage proved it to be ahead of the class.

Yet I still find bewildering the whole idea of filming a TV drama series "LIVE." A few years ago when CBS' "Rescue 911" fascinated the mind with their unrealistic re-enactments — back then considered gory — the show remained an edit-copy-paste series. It wasn't exactly feasible to present a theatrical approach to medicine, while engaging in triple-bypass surgery and facing life or death moral dilemmas. Somehow through months of planning and weeks of intense rehearsals, the cast and crew of NBC's "ER" pulled it off — with only a couple of errors.

Still, ER's raw production wasn't exactly a walk in the park. The live performance actually established itself entirely inside the studio, encompassing an area with the average dimensions of your typical hospital emergency room, including all hospital accessories (even the break room). Remember this was live. There were no ifs ands, or buts — no time to cut scenes and move camera equipment at the director's discretion. What had actually happened here was a clash of interest. The clash occurred between actors, viewers and that irritating camera crew, which somehow gave off an odor of weasle-like insensitive reporters.

Even with the tiresome start that had me thinking whether this was a feeble attempt at boosting the show's ratings through the roof — the mid-show brawl became its savior. It seemed that for the first 30 minutes of "ER," NBC had been running a documentary on the life history of Dr. Mark Greene (Anthony Edwards), Dr. Ross (George Clooney) and the rest of their entourage. After the classic adrenaline rush, the pumped-up version of "ER" that everyone loves made its entrance — after a sleepy introduction.

What really drove me up the wall was the ambivalence I had towards this episode. Its bizarre combination documentary and drama formulated a somewhat queasy seesaw effect: Was there a necessity to have the constant interview with the staff of "ER?"

It was more like the obnoxious, showy cast of "ER." There was a pleasing atmosphere in seeing well-educated actors demonstrate their skills by rambling off medical jargon — which they most admirably performed. Yet what was the constant need for the flippant attitudes? Let us not forget Dr. Greene who happened to be psychologically wired and at times almost out of line — with the exception of his heartbreaking interview. Aren't doctors supposed to be the level-headed, logical good guys?

By far this live episode of "ER" has to be one of the most risky endeavors taken in TV drama series history. I wouldn't be the first to recommend a retake, but one never knows what the prime-time kings have in mind. In a few words of advice: Stick to the script and keep away from the live footage. This isn't CNN on assignment. "ER" has become one of America's favorites and soon to be legendary shows. The reason? We like our fantasy-land nighttime dramas — not reality, shot live.

to three straight Centennial League Championships, including two undefeated seasons in league play, and two state finals. From her midfield position, Machamer scored an astounding 145 points on 53 goals and 39 assists in her four-year Bruin career.

For a completely asinine comparison on my part, UMass' all-time leading scorer, midfielder Rebecca Myers, set her four-year mark last season with 101 points on 38 goals and 25 assists — but she missed the second half of '96 season.

Like I said, an asinine comparison... but with that, I think we can officially say that both players are good.

Rudy had Machamer penciled in on the left flank for his squad, and truthfully, every once in a while he'll slip on his lineup card, accidentally circling her name and number. That is the kind of effect she has had on her coach — from the bench — and that has been from the viewpoint of someone who has only seen her play for other teams.

"She's a left-sided presence, and combined with [senior defender] Amy Burrill, it would have been great to have two lefty's up one side," Rudy said. "Sometimes we get too righty, taking away a lot of options for us. She has the ability to slow down a game with her passing, and play combos quickly and effectively."

Simply said, her high school years were a Rocky Mountain high, and although her UMass career has been a Pioneer Valley low, she is not making any judgements. The only thing she can control is her rehabilitation.

"It's starting to pick up a little bit since I've been out of the brace, but I'm kind of impatient," Machamer said. "I know it is going to take awhile, but I'm the kind of person who likes to see progress."

With that kind of attitude, the future for the current edition of a young and injured squad will be a progressive one — as in, Final Fours and a NCAA Championship.

stepped up to represent UMass in singles action.

The tournament is structured so that No. 1 and 2 players compete in A-Flights, No. 3 and 4 players compete in B- Flights and so on.

Sophomore Rob Manchester made the most of his appearance in the B-Flight division. He finished 3-1 for the event, and made a great impression on head coach Judy Dixon.

"I was thrilled with the way the tournament came out for some of our guys, especially Rob and Pat Slyman," Dixon said. "Hopefully we'll continue to get these types of performances out of them."

Sophomore Pat Slyman, the lone A-Flight representative for UMass, finished 2-2, defeating a possible future opponent in Chris Wilson from Vermont, 6-3, 6-1. He also won a tough three set match against Rutger's No. 1 seed, Tom McGrath 6-1, 3-6, 6-2.

After Cheney, Manchester and Slyman, the lineup is slightly unsteady right now, and as of now, Cheney's status for this week itself is undecided.

The lower portion of the lineup should receive a big boost when senior Alex Aller returns to his old No. 4 position. He had been kept out of his old slot because Dixon felt he needed to get back into top physical condition.

He has met her demands, and she is very excited to have her senior veteran back and in the right competitive mindset. Dixon's goal is to get the most she can out of her No. 5 man in sophomore Parsa Samii, and her No. 6 player in fellow soph Kevin Curley.

Samii struggled over the weekend at West Point, and Curley is new to the lineup, and especially to doubles play.

"In singles competition, we can play with anyone," Dixon said. "In doubles, we are a little short-handed right now. We are working with Kevin [Curley] to get him better acclimated with doubles play."

Manchester, who plays No. 1 doubles alongside Todd Cheney, could be the key to the Minutemen at this critical stage of the season.

"We need to get together as a team and stay focused", Manchester said. "We've gone through some big changes, but we are just as tough mentally as we were last year. Hopefully, we'll come out alright.'

"The way these guys have played in the past, I am confident about playing M.I.T., and Vermont," Dixon said. "Talent-wise we are right there with them."

Patriots, Broncos face off

FOXBORO, Mass. (AP) — Don't show up late when the New England Patriots or Denver Broncos play. Scoring early is a trademark of the AFC's only two unbeaten teams.

On his first series of the season, Drew Bledsoe threw a touchdown pass. On his first two possessions, John Elway directed his team to field goals.

And next Monday night, the NFL's highest scoring teams play each other. The Patriots haven't forgotten that the last time that happened the Broncos led 14-0 just 7:13 into the game and won 34-8 last Nov. 17.

"You've got to stop them early because once they get up, then it changes the whole game plan." New England free safety Willie Clay said.

The Broncos may feel the same way about the Patriots, who are 10-2 since that rout, including playoff games. New England's offense, defense and confidence are better than they were last season, when they went to the Super Bowl.

"What we're developing here is a confidence that, at some point, we're going to get you," offensive tackle Bruce Armstrong said. "Even if we start out kind of sluggish, (the defense) gives us the opportunity to get everything in shape and not have to worry about having to come from 14 or 21 or 28 points down,"

That's what Patriots opponents have faced this season as three of New England's victories were 41-7, 31-6 and 31-3. The Patriots scored touchdowns on their first possessions in three of their games and on the first or second in all four.

The Broncos have won four of their five games by at least 16 points. They've scored on each of their first two possessions in three games and on the first or second in four.

It may be more important for the Patriots to score early Monday night, considering the raucous fans they'd like to silence at Mile High Stadium, where they've lost nine straight games since their last win in 1968.

"The greatest equalizer we can have is to go out there and have success early." New England fullback Keith Byars said. "Then you can just get into the flow of your game."

The Patriots lead the NFL in scoring with 32.5 points per game, while Denver is second with 31.2. There's no guarantee, though, that scoring early leads to an easy win.

A-10 Tournament rematch tonight in Cage

The nation watches as sophomore setter Kari Hogancamp leads the Minutewomen

By Jamie Jee
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts volleyball team will look to continue their winning ways tonight at the Curry Hicks Cage, taking on Atlantic 10 rival Rhode Island at 7 p.m. Among the many players will be looking to serve, set, spike and dig their way to yet another conference win is sophomore setter and outside hitter Kari Hogancamp.

Her mere name strikes fear into the hearts of opponents.

Why?

Well, because her presence on the court wins games.

Hogancamp will be entering tonight's match as the nation's leader in digs, a big honor for a athlete only in her second year of Division I play, and you can bet the Rams know it.

"We've improved a lot since the beginning of the season, and our team unity has been carrying us along," Hogancamp said. "This year I've been able to feel more relaxed because of the difference in pressure between playing as a freshman and now as an upper-classman."

Minutewomen coach Bonnie Kenny is direct in her praise of Hogancamp's effect on this year's 8–5 squad.

"If anyone has carried this team so far this season, it has been Kari Hogancamp," Kenny said.

Hogancamp hails from Huntington Beach, Calif., where she trained with fellow sophomore standout Jill Meyers this past summer. That training has helped to continue her excellent play of last season, setting and playing outside effectively.

Yet, all of this started when Hogancamp began playing volleyball in the sixth grade, while developing a true love for the game early in high school.

She was voted an Orange-County Register Scholar-Athlete choice as a junior, and a Fab 50 prospect her senior year by Volleyball Monthly, playing in the California North-South All-Star Game, while earning a silver medal at the 1994 Junior Olympics. Hogancamp has excelled off the court as well, being named to the UMass Athletic Director's honor roll for both semesters in her freshman year.

Amidst all these honors, her love of the game has never abated.

"I knew I wanted to continue playing after high school, where I built my love for the game," Hogancamp said. "I had a lot of fun, and I've been able to carry it over to the collegiate level."

Last year, Hogancamp proved that she is one of the top young players in the A-10 Conference, and the Northeast Region, by setting a new UMass single-season record with 529 digs. That mark surpassed senior Lesley Nolan's mark of 463 set in 1995, while also being just seven shy of the A-10 record. She also led the conference with 4.1 digs a game, posting 20 or more on nine different occasions.

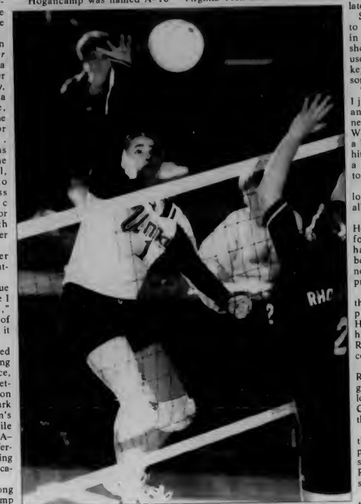
"I think we've all been strong defensively this year," Hogancamp said. "If I can help turn a bad game around with a couple of good digs, it just helps the team morale. That way we can play the rest of the match that much better."

Hogancamp was named A-10 Rookie of the Week for the week of Nov. 24, posting her then-career high dig mark at Virginia Tech that week with 28 digs, following up that 3-1 win over the Hokies with a 25-dig effort in their 3-2 win over George Washington just two days later.

Simply said, she has continued to display her versatility thus far in the season. Hogancamp has showed creativity at the net and used her steely shot selection as a key weapon throughout the season.

"When I make a mistake I know I just have to forget it and go out and play," Hogancamp said. "I never forget that I love defense. We can always improve as a team a little bit everywhere. When our hitting is consistent, and we have a better percentage, we're tough to beat.

"On the court we have to talk a lot to get the team together. We all have to do our own part."



Although only a sophomore, Hogancamp has been a role model for her teammates through her hard work, prevailing despite being smaller than many opponents. However, she deflects any praise for the sake of the team.

"Chemistry has been key for us this year, although we still haven't played a perfect match," Hogancamp said. "I think we'll have to be close to one against Rhode Island. Hopefully, I can continue to see the ball well."

According to Hogancamp, Rhode Island should be a big game, with the Minutewomen looking to avenge last year's A-10 Conference Tournament loss to the Rams.

"If we can stay on track I think the end of the season looks very positive," Hogancamp said, who said that the return of freshman Rebecca Hasson should boost the squad's success.

"We played a lot of strong teams in the preseason and that's strengthened our conference play. Everyone's stepped up."

Miami's loss earns them the Schwag

It's an interesting time to be an Iowa Hawkeye fan.

They've been on the cusp of Big Ten superiority for years, but they always seem to blow it when they face the Ohio State's and Michigan's of the world. (But hey, don't be sad Hayden Frye. So does everyone else). They were supposed to have a Heisman candidate this year, a wide-out by the name of Tim Dwight.

Well, they were supposed to do what they always do, choke somewhere important in the season, and end up booking a trip to the Copper Bowl. (If the Bluebonnet Bowl was still around, Iowa would go every year, and squeak out wins over teams like Arkansas and Cal).

Luke Meredith
OTL

But what's happened in Iowa City has been rather remarkable. They've blown out four straight teams in such a manner that they've forced everyone to notice. They have a Heisman candidate all right, but it ain't Dwight.

Tavian Banks, who you, me and the rest of the unwashed masses had never heard of a month ago, (well, maybe you wash, but you still had never heard of him), has rushed for 835 yards and 12 touchdowns in four games.

835 yards, four games.

Okay, you're pretty good.

But here comes the test. After thumping the likes of Iowa State, Tulsa, Northern Iowa and Illinois, the Hawkeyes have to face Ohio St. and Michigan on the road the next two weekends. Given their history, it'll be hard for a Iowa booster to get excited about that.

But they should get excited about this. Should they pull off one of the most successful road trips in recent memory, and bring home the fallen heads of the Buckeyes and Wolverines back to Iowa City, (which would make the 6 o'clock news because hey, let's face it, there ain't much else going on in Iowa City), they should be No. 1.

The Big Ten is, without a doubt, the toughest conference in America this year, and beating two of the top six teams in America on the road is grounds for a No. 1 ranking.

Can they do it? If history is any indication, no. But history can change. (I know. I once got a B in "U.S. History since Pearl Harbor").

Booty Schwag of the Week Award...

U2 has sung a lot of songs in its day. I swear. But one of my favorites is "Miami," one of the new ones. (You know, it's real techno wackiness). There's a line in it that made me think of the Miami–West Virginia game Saturday.

It goes, "We could make something beautiful, something that wouldn't be a problem, at least not in Miami."

I don't know if Bono had checked out a Miami game recently, because that line sounds a lot like what opponents have been doing to the Hurricanes lately.

Yes, after blowing the Arizona St. game in the Orange bowl, Miami did it again on Saturday, losing to the Mountaineers. Before a home crowd that filled about half of the Orange Bowl, the Canes went out and proudly declared their fall from grace. After winning over 50 games in a row in Orange Bowl, Miami loses at home more than it wins.

And nobody even goes to the games any more.

Teams have been going to the Orange Bowl and making something beautiful — it sure hasn't been a problem lately.

But I'll tell you the straw that broke the back of the Booty Schwag voters (which me, me and me).

During the Michigan–Notre Dame game, Keith Jackson had to do promos for this weekend, including the Miami–Florida St. game. Not once did he say, "Whoa Nellie, it'll be a bahhn–burnahhh down in Tallahassee on Saturday."

In fact, he didn't say anything at all.

That, my friends, is truly an implied Schwag vote from Keith.

The "Why I love ESPN's College Gameday" reason of the week...

Because it's wicked awesome.

Friends of the Program "Inside Tip" Pick of the Week... (2–1)

Oh yeah, Ohio St. covered.

But this week might be a little "iffy," if you will.

This week, Tennessee Is a 25 1/2 point favorite at home versus Ole Miss.

They could win by 50 1/2. The Vols are smarting after choking against Florida, and should be desperate to prove they're still in the national championship hunt.

How do you do that? Why, you run up score.

I'm sure Peyton Manning won't have a problem with a few more TD passes in a now wide-open Heisman race.

Hard road for Minutemen in Meet of Champions

By Scott Hamill
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts men's cross country coach, Ken O'Brien, knew he had his work cut out for him when the season started.

The coach for the Minutemen started with a young team that included just one returning varsity runner. Through three meets this season, his group is slowly gaining experience, while facing some of the top competition in the country.

This past weekend, UMass traveled to Van Cortlandt Park in the borough of the Bronx, N.Y. for the Meet of Champions. Of the seven-team field, the Minutemen finished 11th, the same position as last year. Six of the teams this year are nationally ranked, so UMass knew they were in for a tough meet.

"I'm sort of disappointed overall," O'Brien said. "We finished the same as last year, but the kids were about 15–30 seconds slower than last years' pace. It's a reach in comparison, with first year runners versus third year runners."

Last year, UMass scored 310 points, while this year they improved to 289. Iona was the overall champion of this year's Meet of Champions with 41 points, followed by Life College at 47 points.

For the Minutemen, captain Ryan Carrara was again the top finisher at 33rd overall, covering the five mile course in 25:56.

"Ryan's strong, he's got good focus and concentration," O'Brien said. "He responded positively to the competition."

Peter Gleason finished 58th overall in a time of 26:44, followed by Kevin Somers' finish in 71st place at 27:18. Rounding out the top five for UMass were Brendan Sullivan in 78th place at a time of 27:36, and Sean Murphy in 83rd place at a time of 28:18.

Despite the disappointing performance, O'Brien isn't too pessimistic for the rest of the season. O'Brien said that the large meets are "good preparation for later on, and we get to say 'here's what we did wrong and here's how we can improve.'"

Next week, UMass travels to Lehigh University in Bethlehem, Pa. for the Paul Short Invitational. This meet will include teams from all over the country, as opposed to last week's Meet of Champions, which mostly included teams from the East Coast.

"It's another larger meet, larger than the Meet of Champions, and just as competitive," O'Brien said. "It's part of our growth, for both rookies and veterans, running in large meets.

"We compete with new, but as highly regarded, athletes, and we're not running against the same people. Different people, different schools and different uniforms pose new challenges."

Is this the year of the Kat? Machamer looking to 1998

Were you always the one that was picked last for a team in high school gym class, and then had to sit on the bench, watching everybody else have all the fun?

Come on, you can admit it to us... really, it didn't make you a loser, it just meant you weren't good. That's all.

There's one player for the No. 15 Massachusetts women's soccer team who never had a problem being picked for a team, because she is good. Unfortunately, that player has spent this entire season on the bench, watching her teammates have all the fun.

Men's Tennis

Massachusetts vs. M.I.T.

This past summer, freshman midfielder Kathleen Machamer had the whole world in her hands. A star recruit for the perennial Top 20 Minutewomen squad, she was projected as a starter. Coach Jim Rudy lost his entire midfield to graduation, and The Player Officially Known As "Kat" was an early X-mas stocking stuffer for his team.

Until this past summer, and more specifically, July 15th... Machamer was practicing with her club team, the Lakewood Fury of Colorado, for the national championships. Making a cut in the midfield, Kat planted her foot, and her freshman season for UMass was lost in the earth-shattering pop of her anterior cruciate ligament in her knee.

Now, the resident of Englewood Co. has to watch from one of the most unfamiliar places she's known on the soccer pitch — the bench. It's been hard, but like the conclusion of Monty Python's The Life of Brian propounds, Machamer is looking "on the bright side of life."

"It's been hard because I'm used to playing, but in the long run, I think this whole experience might be good for me," Machamer said. "Being able to see what is going on from the bench, and having no pressure on me to learn everything right away, I've learned a lot more from the coach.

"I've seen a lot more stuff going on the field, which will help me when I come back next season."

After a hard weekend in northern Texas, where UMass suffered a string of losses against No. 18 Southern Methodist and California–Berkeley, Machamer unfortunately epitomizes the fortunes of the Minutewomen — a young team injured from the start of the season.

For coach Jim Rudy, the health problems for his team are in the present tense, but concerning Machamer, her recovery is in the future tense.

"Kat's doing really well with this, and she's been keeping positive about it," Rudy said. "Even with the injury, she's made herself a part of this team by standing by us, no doubt about it. I can't wait for her to join us, but I have to wait.

"She will bounce back from this, I'm sure of that, and there's no pressure on her to return early for the postseason. We're looking at her return in the long term."

Machamer is as close to a can't miss prospect as a team can get, and her list of accomplishments for an 18-year-old is amazing — to say the least.

With her two club teams in Colorado, the Cherry Creek Lightning and the Lakewood Fury, won a total of five State Cup Championships, advancing to three Far West Regional Finals, while winning the 1997 Far West Regional crown.

A First Team Olympic Development Program star from 1989–1996, Machamer also had time for Cherry Creek High School, helping lead them

UMass tennis a team once again

By Sanford Appell

The Massachusetts men's tennis team is gearing up for their first real challenges of the fall season. Awaiting them today is a matchup at Massachusetts Institute of Technology, which promises to be tough conquest for the young squad. After this match, the team will travel to Vermont on Friday.

As of this point in the season, the team has only played together in team competition twice this month. They handled a lesser opponent in Wesleyan, while having portions of their match with Rhode Island being postponed due to weather.

This fact has left the coaching staff with an unclear picture of where the team is headed this season.

"I'm not quite sure what to expect right now with guys getting injured and everything else," assistant coach Jason Bedford said. "We're hoping to have everyone ready and healthy for these next couple of matches.

"Hopefully, we'll come out with some wins, and then move on with a clearer picture."

There are some positive notes for the team coming off last weekend's successful West Point Invitational tournament.

While No. 1 seed Todd Cheney missed the tournament due to injury, several others

English bullies arrested after suicide of teen

LONDON (AP) — For three years, Kelly Yeomans endured taunts of "fatty." Her teen-age tormentors threw salt in her school lunch and dumped her clothes in the garbage. Last week, they pelted her house, first with stones and finally with butter and eggs, the ingredients for cake.

The chubby, sweet-faced 13-year-old told her parents she couldn't stand the abuse anymore. While they slept on Sunday night, she took a fatal overdose of painkillers.

Police have arrested four neighborhood boys and one girl, ranging in age from 13 to 17, and say more arrests are possible. However, the arrested youths were not charged with any crime and were released without bail. It was not clear what would happen to them since all are juveniles, authorities said.

Even in a country where bullying is commonplace, Kelly's death came as a shock and the media have given wide coverage to the tragedy.

Sixth grade student killed selling candy

TOMS RIVER, N.J. (AP) — Before he was found strangled near his home, 11-year-old Eddie Werner was eagerly pursuing a set of walkie-talkies, the top prize for selling the most candy and wrapping paper for his school's PTA.

He was going door to door alone — a practice discouraged by most fund-raising groups — and sales were going so well he was flashing a $200 wad of bills to friends.

Yesterday, prosecutors said, Eddie was a victim of his own success, killed for his money by a 15-year-old boy who answered the sixth-grader's knock on the door.

The 15-year-old boy, whose name was not released, was charged with murder and aggravated sexual assault in a case that has focused new attention on the widespread practice of using children to raise money for schools and other nonprofit organizations. Door-to-door selling is discouraged by the national PTA, the child's school district, youth organizations, as well as the multibillion-dollar industry that puts products into the hands of a juvenile sales force.

Chancellor Scott, Vanin address excessive Homecoming drinking

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

Concerned about how much students are abusing alcohol on campus, University of Massachusetts Chancellor David K. Scott issued a statement yesterday stating the "school will begin a re-examination of its alcohol policy."

This announcement is a direct result of complaints concerning inappropriate alcohol-related behavior and disturbances during last weekend's tailgating at the Homecoming football game.

In addition, Scott is also concerned about the recent alcohol-related deaths at Louisiana State University and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

There were over a thousand "young people, not all UMass students, who stayed in the parking lot to drink while the football game was being played," said University spokesperson Kay Scanlon.

"A number of students were climbing up onto trucks and vans. It was not a safe environment," she said.

"In an effort to have a good time, students were putting themselves in danger," said Dean of Students Jo-Anne Vanin.

According to Scanlon, Scott referred to the tailgating events as a "disaster waiting to happen."

University Chancellor Scott said that although our alcohol polices are strict, "we can do more."

"Drinking is a big problem on campus and across the nation and it just seems to be getting worse and worse," Scanlon said.

She may be right.

Since the end of August, two college students have died from binge drinking.

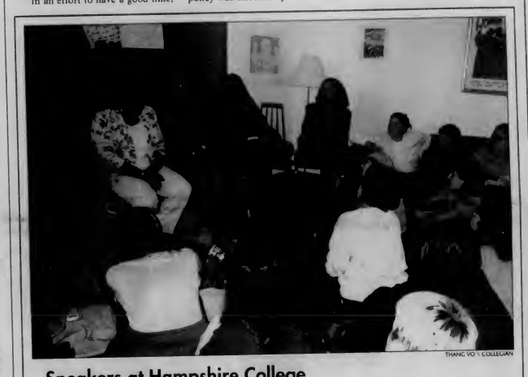
In August, a LSU fraternity student died and MIT freshman Scott Krueger died on Monday, after spending three days in an alcohol-induced coma.

"The re-examination of the alcohol policy is definitely justifiable. UMass needs to take the pre-cautionary steps to ensure similar events to MIT and LSU don't happen here," said Student Government Association President Lia Wong.

However, questions were also raised as to whether Scott's decision to review the current alcohol policy was affected by the weekend death of Adam Prentice on campus.

According to Scanlon, "rumors surrounding the death of Prentice" indicate the accident may have involved alcohol.

But according to Vanin, the Chancellor's decision "was not in direct response to Adam's death. It was in response to what he saw while attending the football game."



University officials are still awaiting Prentice's toxicology results to determine if alcohol did play a role in his death.

"Out of concern for the safety of our students on this campus, I think it is a good time to start reviewing our present policies," said Vanin.

"This is a caring community and we all must intensify our efforts to ensure the safety and well-being of our students, faculty and staff," Scott said.

"We are a community of adults who live and work and study together, and we should take on the responsibility of caring for each other in a meaningful way," he added.

Clean dorm door policy being tested in Southwest

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

In an effort to improve the appearance residence halls, Housing Services has implemented a "room door policy" in both Southwest/South and Southwest/North Residential Areas for the current semester.

In a memo from Jeff Ederer, Area Director of Southwest South, to residence directors, assistant residence directors and resident assistants, door monitoring started Sept. 24 by Maintenance and Operations staff.

"If a student's door is noted for graffiti, the room will be sent a notice indicating that the residents have one week in which to clean their door. If the door is not cleaned by the next Wednesday, it will cost $30 for repainting and/or $25.50 for extra cleaning," Ederer wrote.

The goal of this policy is to give the residence halls a better overall appearance. Housing Services, as well as Maintenance Operations staff, hope that if the hallways look more presentable, students will have more respect for where they live.

This policy was implemented as a pilot program in Southwest/North last year and gained positive feedback.

Only 53 out of the 337 doors cited needed work orders generated to have doors cleaned or fixed. Of them, five students appealed the citations.

"Last year [in Southwest/North], rooms were in far better shape when students checked out. It kind of spilled over into the way residents treated their rooms," said Gaye Reinhold, Operations Manager of Southwest/North.

According to Michael Burchell, Area Director of Southwest/North, by citing doors and having them cleaned or painted on a need basis throughout the year, time is freed up during the summer for other projects.

"Maintenance and Operations, who would normally spend a lot of the summer painting doors, can use that time to improve our facilities in other ways," Burchell said.

"Last summer, Kennedy and Coolidge [residence halls] bathrooms were painted top to bottom because we didn't need to do doors," Reinhold said.

"The goal of this policy is to give the residence halls a better overall appearance."

If the program goes smoothly, results will be taken to the area government and the policy may be implemented elsewhere.

"This is a pilot program in Southwest, it's not a housing policy per se. We will assess the outcome, and go to residential committees if there is a positive result," Burchell said.

There have been some questions about this program, specifically in Southwest/South. Information given to residents was not as detailed as that given to residents of Southwest/North.

"We might have done better giving people more notice in Southwest/South, there wasn't as much detail. Some of the student leaders live in Southwest/South and their antennas went up when they heard about it [the policy]. It may have seemed unfair, but that was not our intention," said Michael Gilbert, Director of Housing Services.

Brian Tirrell, Student Trustee, has expressed disapproval with the policy.

"Students pay for their rooms and should be allowed to put things, within reason, on their door. Housing shouldn't have a say. My take is that it's unnecessary," Tirrell said.

Before the policy was instated, Reinhold said that a majority of the doors had writing on them, because people were using them to leave messages instead of using dry erase boards.

"When I walked through the buildings, a good 75 to 80 percent of doors were written on; they were used as large message boards. The outside of the door is public space," Reinhold said.

Tirrell disagrees with the belief that the door is public space and feels that any offensive graffiti should be dealt with on a case by case basis.

"Students don't feel some person should arbitrarily be deciding what's appropriate on their door," Tirrell said.

There is flexibility in the process, and collecting fines isn't the main objective, according to Reinhold.

"If we report to paint a room that has been cleaned off in interim, we let it go, and don't charge the student. So there is some flexibility here," Reinhold said.

This policy will be evaluated at the end of the 1997–1998 academic year.

Health Board moves forward with plans for smoking ban

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Smoking and drinking were the controversial topics at the Amherst Board of Health meeting on Tuesday.

Smoking ban regulations will proceed to be written, the Board decided, despite a presentation against the smoking ban by Pub and Rafters owner Jerry Jolly.

The proposed ban will force bars to be smoke-free, an addition to a 1994 public buildings smoking ban, from which they were originally exempted.

In his presentation, Jolly noted that Amherst has 15 bars, which employ 295 employees and pay $3.5 million in wages.

According to Jolly, in 1994, the Pub voluntarily chose to go smoke-free for a four-month period, during which time his sales went down 20 percent.

If all 15 Amherst bars were to suffer a similar 20 percent loss in profits, 100 jobs would be lost, Jolly said.

Jolly also said that none of the surrounding towns has a smoking ban in bars on their immediate agendas, or are even considering such a ban.

Jolly and other bar owners are concerned customers will travel to bars in Hadley and Northampton that allow smoking.

Hermia Salisbury of the Board of Health said that while the Board appreciated Jolly's presentation, they will continue to develop the smoking ban.

She cautions that the ban is far from being completed, and that the public will have further opportunities to give the Board their input.

Jolly said that the Board is not considering the exception of businesses which install expensive air filtration systems, which he installed at the Pub at a great cost.

He also said that the Board feels justified in pushing for the smoking ban now, despite the lack of support by surrounding communities, who decided not to get involved in a regional smoking ban in bars.

"[The Board] thinks that more people are against second hand smoke now than there were in 1994," Jolly said.

Health department officials also expressed concern over drinking problems in Amherst, but have not decided to take any action on the issue.

"We'll look into it," Salisbury said, "but that's way in the future."

Jolly said that if the Board of Health keeps trying to legislate behavior in bars, people will be driven to neighborhood parties, which could cause more problems than are solved.

"It will be like speakeasies during prohibition," Jolly said.

Bosnian Serb TV taken off the air

By Srecko Latal
Associated Press

SARAJEVO, Bosnia-Herzegovina — NATO-led troops seized transmitters and yanked Bosnian Serb TV off the air yesterday for broadcasts deemed inflammatory and destructive of Western peace efforts.

The pre-dawn action — one of the boldest yet by the Western alliance — seemed intended to signal its new resolve to silence Bosnian Serb hardliners, in particular wartime leader Radovan Karadzic.

"It shows we are willing to take tough, hard measures to make sure there is no mucking around with the Dayton peace process," said British Defense Secretary George Robertson. "This is part of a calibrated and progressive tightening of the screw."

Praising the hundreds of American, French, Italian, Scandinavian, Polish and Russian troops involved in the raids, NATO Secretary General Javier Solana warned: "We will act swiftly against those who do not support" the U.S.-brokered peace accords. The Bosnian Serb government loyal to Karadzic went into emergency session and issued a terse statement threatening what it termed "a tough reaction" to the NATO move.

Yesterday's raids silenced Serb radio and television for hours. When programming eventually resumed in mid-afternoon, it came from Banja Luka, the base of Bosnian Serb President Biljana Plavsic, who is currently locked in a power struggle with Karadzic. Until yesterday, programming had alternated each day between Pale TV, loyal to Karadzic, and Banja Luka TV, which had not inserted foreign officials' comments or attacked the peace accords. The NATO force took over four transmitters in the north, northeast, southeast and near Sarajevo. There was no violence, but the potential was there — smaller-scale takeovers of transmitters by NATO-led troops earlier this month drew violent protests by Serbs, egged on by pro-Karadzic radio and television.

NATO helicopters hovered over one transmitter site, on Mount Trebevic near Sarajevo, while armored vehicles blocked all roads linking it to Pale, Karadzic's headquarters. In the northeast, at Udrigovo, peace force soldiers patrolled the area around the transmitter, sectioned off by razor wire. A Bradley fighting vehicle stood nearby.

Next to the transmitter stood a 6-foot wooden cross erected after NATO bombings in late summer 1995 that helped end the Bosnian war. It bore an inscription to Serb soldiers: "Victims of NATO bombings."

A clearly anxious Plavsic appealed last night to foreign officials to restore Pale's programming. Even though the NATO action was "justified," she said, it was clear she was anxious not to rile the Karadzic camp and appear to benefit from foreign intervention.

The immediate cause for yesterday's raids was a Sunday night broadcast on Pale television of a news conference by Louise Arbour, chief prosecutor of the U.N. war crimes tribunal in The Hague, Netherlands. The Pale broadcast removed Arbour's call for Karadzic to be arrested to face war crimes charges and included commentary suggesting the tribunal was anti-Serb.

McKinney's sexual misconduct case moves closer to trial

By Donald M. Rothberg
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The sexual misconduct case against Sgt. Maj. of the Army Gene McKinney moved within a step of trial yesterday when a reviewing officer concurred with a recommendation that McKinney be court-martialed.

Col. Owen Powell sent his report to Maj. Gen. Robert Foley, who will make the final decision on whether McKinney should stand trial.

Six women have alleged that McKinney made improper sexual advances toward them.

All six testified at a Fort McNair hearing to determine if there was sufficient evidence to order a court-martial.

McKinney, the Army's top enlisted soldier, has denied all the allegations.

Powell, commander of the Fort Myer Military Community, ordered the hearing and appointed Col. Robert Jarvis to preside. The proceeding lasted eight weeks, one of the longest such hearings in Army history.

Jarvis recommended that McKinney be court-martialed on 22 counts, including indecent assault, adultery and obstruction of justice, and sent his report to Powell for review.

The Army has refused to say what either Jarvis or Powell recommended. But sources close to the case, speaking on condition of anonymity, confirmed that both officers recommended the matter go to trial.

The brief Army announcement said that Foley could dismiss the charges, order nonjudicial action, return the case to Powell for disposition or order a general court-martial.

Charles Gittins, McKinney's civilian lawyer, has said that if a court-martial is ordered he will file a motion detailing cases in which general officers accused of the same activity alleged against McKinney were not threatened with prosecution. He said the officers were allowed to retire with full benefits.

Earlier this week, Gittins filed a motion denouncing the Jarvis report as "flimsy and superficial."

He said that Jarvis' 2 1/2-page report had "no critical analysis of the evidence or explanation of what circumstances required the testimony of 56 witnesses."

Bill to allow student loan refinancing

By Robert Greene
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — An emergency measure to help college students and graduates refinance their student loans received overwhelming approval yesterday from a House committee.

The measure, approved 43-0 by the House Education and Workforce Committee, would enable students to refinance their direct loans through private lenders instead of the Education Department. The bill comes in response to severe problems the department and its contractor, Electronic Data Systems Corp., of Plano, Texas, have had in coping with a flood of applications.

The full House is expected to take up the measure later this month. The Senate would then consider it.

The problems have to do with the newer direct loans offered by the Education Department, not the loans made by private lenders but backed by the government.

The bill would let borrowers get the same favorable interest rates offered in the direct program.

The department in late August had to quit taking requests to refinance its direct loans due to a backlog of tens of thousands of applications.

Refinancing allows people to repay student loans on more favorable terms. Borrowers can save $100 or more a month.

Refinancing is often essential for people wanting to borrow money to buy a house.

"My legislation provides an immediate solution for students now, in the short term, rather than making them wait months for the department and its contractor to straighten things out," said Rep. Howard P. "Buck" McKeon (R-Calif.) chairman of the subcommittee on post-secondary education.

Republicans favor the older, guaranteed-loan program, which benefits private lenders with an interest-rate subsidy. They argue that the problems with refinancing show the department cannot manage the direct lending program.

Democrats on the committee supported the bill as a temporary relief measure but said they were worried that the private lenders would not accept as many applications.

Dallas firm accepts Paula Jones case

By Dara Akiko Tom
Associated Press

SAN MARINO, Calif. — Paula Jones announced yesterday she will fight her sex harassment lawsuit against President Clinton with lawyers from Dallas and money raised by a conservative organization in Virginia. And the lawyers said they are not interested in settling out of court.

Mrs. Jones stood with her spokeswoman, Susan Carpenter-McMillan, for the announcement and made only brief comments.

"I'm excited about the future. Why should I be scared?" Mrs. Jones said.

She will be represented by the Dallas firm of Rader, Campbell, Fisher & Pyke. Her previous lawyers, Joe Cammarata and Gilbert Davis, recently withdrew from the case after years of work. In a statement, the new lawyers said they were "retained as litigation counsel, not as special settlement counsel... We intend to vigorously prepare it for trial."

"In a court of law, there are no presidents and no plebeians — all parties are equal in the eyes of justice," the statement said. The spokeswoman said the new lawyers chose the conservative Rutherford Institute of Charlottesville, Va., for fund-raising after Mrs. Jones made it clear she could not afford to pay. "This law firm is willing to go to trial... That's what Paula has always wanted," Carpenter-McMillan said.

The Rutherford Institute describes itself as a nonprofit legal and educational organization that specializes "in the defense of religious liberty and human rights."

It has taken the cases of a Virginia schoolboy whose teachers barred him from bringing Rush Limbaugh books to class and a woman who was not allowed to place a nativity scene outside a Fairfax County, Va., government building.

Asked about Mrs. Jones' new lawyers and the conservative financing for her case, White House press secretary Mike McCurry said, "I don't think that's particularly surprising. But as to who she selects as her legal representation, that's a matter for her to decide."

UMass Police Chief John Luippold said he supports the Chancellor's decision to review the alcohol policies.

"I feel that many incidents that we [public safety] become involved in, especially in Residence Halls, find that alcohol is a contributing factor," said Luippold.

Luippold said he is concerned a majority of those problems concern underage students as well.

"Anyone who works in student life knows that alcohol has been a big concern for many years," said Vanin. "Generally we are concerned about the role that alcohol plays in social scenes."

A committee to address the current policy is expected to be assigned within the next few days.

According to the Undergraduate Rights and Responsibilities handbook, the current policy states, "no one under 21 years of age shall transport, purchase, sell, possess, or receive alcoholic beverages."

According to a press release, Scott wants a "campus–wide discussion about risks and consequences of alcohol abuse and look for immediate action that the University might consider."

Wong agrees that student involvement is very important.

"I would like to be involved with the review committee. Student input is vital to this issue," she said.

Some of these recommendations could include encouraging students to set up a voluntary escort plan for people walking home from parties, encouraging peers to discourage inappropriate behavior, such as binge drinking, and continuing to examine policies that affect the fraternity and sorority system, including alcohol policies.

In addition to these ideas, Wong feels that educating freshmen is vital.

"We are trying to create a new gen-ed called UMass 1000 which all frosh would have to take. We could incorporate alcohol education in to the curriculum and that way we could reach all the freshmen," Wong said.

Confronting campus binge drinking

I wonder how many people stepped over the body of 18- year-old Scott Krueger Friday night as he lay on the basement floor of an M.I.T fraternity house in a pile of his own vomit and empty liquor bottles?

Do you think it was the freshman pledge's designated "big brother" who handed Krueger drink number 15 out of the approximated 16 drinks he consumed to reach a blood alcohol level of 0.410 percent — five times the legal driving limit in Massachusetts?

As Krueger lay in an alcohol-induced coma all weekend, thousands of students right on this campus engaged in the same type of behavior that eventually killed the M.I.T. freshman Monday night— binge drinking.

Do you think it was the freshman pledge's designated "big brother" who handed Krueger drink number 15 out of the approximated 16 drinks he consumed to reach a blood alcohol level of 0.410 percent?

Laura Stock

The fact that more people spent Homecoming Game Day in the parking lot than in the stadium is indicative of a greater problem than UMass having a lousy football team.

And, although toxicology reports have yet to be completed, rumors surrounding the death of UMass junior Adam Prentice on Saturday suggest that he may have been drinking before his fatal fall.

The University took the first step toward addressing the problem of alcohol abuse on campus yesterday, as Chancellor Scott issued a statement saying that the school is going to re-examine its alcohol policies.

"We are beginning a comprehensive review of our alcohol beverage policies," Scott said. "These policies are strict, but we can do more."

Damn right we can do more. We, though, not them.

The University's current policy on alcohol is fairly strict already, and is basically in keeping with state and federal laws that you must be 21 years old to consume or posses liquor. In fact, at UMass even 21-year-olds are limited as to how much booze they can bring into their dorm rooms — a 24-pack case of beer or 64 ounces of wine or alcohol.

If they are so concerned, what the University should address is the enforcement of such policies. How did an estimated one to two thousand students get away with tailgating if public consumption of alcohol is prohibited in the Code of Student Conduct?

Honestly, the R.A.s and police can't catch, or arrest, everyone. Anyone who's hidden a beerball in a gym bag to get past dorm security knows that.

It's up to us students to prevent tragedies like Krueger's from happening here at UMass.

Go out. Party. Get drunk. I'd be a hypocrite if I said not to drink. It's part of the big ol' college experience we are supposed to be having here. The thing is, we have to protect each other. The friend who passes out at the party. The girl who's throwing up on the lawn. The guy who drank 18 beers and is just going out for a walk...

When the news of last weekend's tragedies broke, I was nursing a hangover from a night of celebrating my 21st birthday. A death on campus.

Alcohol poisoning at M.I.T. Even a high school student from North Andover, drinking, who fell down stairs and cracked her skull in two places. She lay there six hours before someone realized she was dead.

I couldn't help wishing that those students had friends like mine. Friends who made sure I didn't drink myself into a coma, who made sure I got home safely and helped me when I got sick.

As authorities conduct a criminal investigation into whether Phi Gamma Delta is responsible for causing Krueger's death, UMass fraternities and their pledges should also listen up.

Last September, in response to a $200,000 settlement of a civil case in which a woman was allegedly raped at Sigma Phi Epsilon in April, 1996, the UMass Interfraternity Council and Panhellenic Association formed the GAMMA (Greeks Advocating the Mature Management of Alcohol) Committee. They published social policy regulations for the Greek Area, which included prohibiting underage drinking, bringing alcohol into parties, and having TIPS-certified bouncers checking I.D.s at the door.

Reportedly, the GAMMA Committee no longer exists, nor does its policy.

The young pledge died from, perhaps forced, alcohol poisoning. His blood turned sticky, like molasses. His blood vessels clotted and his arteries clogged. Flow of blood and oxygen were cut off to his brain, and his brain cells died.

And where were the guys Krueger hoped to call "brothers?"

Laura Stock is a Collegian columnist.

Last call for Time-out?

Luke Meredith

In the summer of 1995, I found my first bar.

I had been to bars before, but never one I could call home. Then I found Woody's Roadhouse. The place was a dump.

Dusty old walls, bathroom stalls without doors. You could get a hot dog with sauerkraut from this scary machine behind the bar for $1.50, and if you bought a pass for the summer, pitchers of Milwaukee's Best for $3.00. If you weren't 21 (like my underage ass), they really didn't care.

Which is why Woody's is no longer with us.

In 1996, I fell in love with a place called the Dalton Depot. It was an old train station that had a patio to drink on and a D.J. that usually spun bad Top 40 hits. The Jaegermeister was always cold and you could flirt all night if you wanted. If you weren't 21, they really didn't care.

Which is why the Dalton Depot is no longer with us.

In my short time on this earth as bar trash, I've seen my two favorite bars taken away by the cruel hands of "Da Man." So I hoped that, since my time as bar trash is quickly becoming replaced by the inevitable call of responsibility, sensibility and sobriety, I could finish out my college days in bars that I like to call home. Time-Out, as much as any bar uptown, was one of those places.

But then they did it again.

If you're uptown this semester, you might have noticed they've turned out the lights at Time-Out. The chairs are up, the door is locked, and nobody really knows when they're coming back on. We hope it'll open before the end of the year. The "I-O" crowd has had to scatter to other locales like lost sheep.

And Amherst has lost a good friend.

On the surface, there was nothing great about the old girl. Time-Out was a quirky little place. It was a sports bar, but there were only two TVs and no wings. (Well, they had wings, but you wouldn't want them. Trust me.)

The entertainment was a jukebox in the corner that played Dave Matthews if you were lucky and Shania Twain if you weren't. It had an autographed picture of O.J. Simpson on the wall. The menu was as varied as the popcorn machine in the back. They had a video golf game nobody ever played. If you got a seat, you were lucky. But they never ran out of beer. Ever.

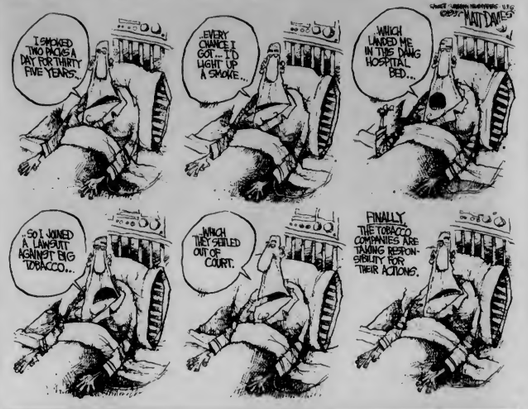
We all had different reasons why we liked the place. My buddy Garv liked Time-Out because he wasn't 21. And they had beer. And it was easy to carry Housemate A out of (which happened more than once).

Housemate A liked Time-Out because he wasn't 21. And they had beer. And it was easy for him to be carried out of. (Which happened more than once... we have the pictures.)

Housemate B liked it because he knew everyone there. I liked it because while you could still bark at the moon (that's what witty people like me call drinking too much and acting like "that guy"), you could just chill too. It was your call. Housemate C liked it because he could always know where we were while he stayed in with his girlfriend. (Yeah, he didn't live with us yet, but that's no excuse.)

But it wasn't the booze that kept bringing us back. It was the people.

The college experience is built on the social life. We, in turn, build our social life on certain places where we can see our friends, share embarrassing moments with care-free wonder and live out the best days of our life in a place we'd never be ashamed to call home.



A lot of my memories of UMass will have Time-Out as the backdrop. Even if you never walked up "the ramp," I'm sure you all have places that make you feel the same way. Yeah, you'll joke about being hammered and acting like "that guy," but deep down there's something else going on.

It's more about a recurring journey, a never-ending story about college kids finding out who they are and what they want out of life. And most of the time, you don't find out any of that in a classroom or a computer lab. You find it in those places that you tell stories about.

For me, Time-Out was one of those places. Those crappy walls, with that O.J. Simpson picture and faded old UMass lacrosse shots from the early 80s, contain the stories of kids just like us from years before, engaging in the eternal college struggle to find themselves. And having the time of their lives searching. Because when it's all said and done, it ain't about that last pitcher. It's about the friends you're sharing it with.

We'll miss you, Time-Out. Let's just hope we haven't seen your last call.

Letters to the Editor

Who is responsible?

To the Editor:

"I'm talking about a spiritual culture — alcohol, and more specifically in this case, beer." — Jorma Kansanen

This quote appeared in this very newspaper a scant two days before the "tragic" death of Adam Prentice. Kansanen goes on to make the appalling though insightful statement that "If there is only one thing that not just holds the student body of the Five College Area together, but the student body of the entire world, it's the pursuit of the spiritual drink."

This is the underlying social tragedy that makes events such as those on Saturday morning inevitable. When alcohol consumption is so socially normalized that people believe it to be the one thing that ties all students (regardless of age) together, something has broken down within the very fabric of our society.

While the majority of the responsibility for this incident rests squarely on Adam Prentice's shoulders, he is not alone in his burden. Anyone that patted Adam's back and shared a smile with him that evening, as he drank number who- knows-what beer, is responsible. Anyone that read the article "mmmmmmm...BEER!" on Thursday and took any part of it seriously is responsible. Anyone that becomes severely intoxicated on a regular basis is responsible. Anyone who regularly pumps money into the thriving alcohol industry is responsible.

In short, we are all responsible, and crying and moaning about the "tragedy" will not do any good. Instead, perhaps society should realize the elements of its structure that lead to these all-too-common events, specifically involving the media's representation of alcohol use. Romanticizing the concept of the "spiritual" drink only brings about the irresponsible behavior, which is completely preventible.

Maybe it's time for the Collegian and Jorma Kansanen to consider their place in the social structure that directly caused the death of Adam Prentice.

[Editor's note: Toxicology tests, which will determine whether Mr. Prentice was intoxicated at the time of his death, have not been completed as of press time. At present the Collegian does not have any information that confirms rumors suggesting Mr. Prentice's death was drug or alcohol related.]

Red Cross responds to recent protest

To the Editor:

The American Red Cross held a campus blood drive on Tuesday, Sept. 23 where a number of students questioned whether or not the American Red Cross practices discrimination in deferring individuals from giving blood.

The American Red Cross is part of the International Movement of Red Cross and Red Crescent Societies. All Red Cross national societies are committed to the principles of impartiality and neutrality, without discriminating as to nationality, race, religious beliefs, class, or political opinions.

The mission of the Red Cross blood program is to provide an adequate blood supply that is as safe as possible. This activity is conducted under a license granted by the Federal Food and Drug Administration, which defines medical history issues and behavioral practices that would make someone ineligible as a donor. The questions the American Red Cross asks of everyone who is present to give blood are mandated by the FDA. These same questions are asked by other organizations that collect blood donations.

The Red Cross does not discriminate against individuals in deferring them from giving blood — the organization distinguishes behavior which the FDA defines as reason for deferral. Red Cross officials do not have the authority to change questions asked of potential donors. Any change would be initiated by the FDA.

For many years the American Red Cross has worked in partnership with the University of Massachusetts community to provide blood to patients in area hospitals. We thank all who give blood for their support, and hope this clarifies blood donation procedures.

Says the Honors College is good

To the Editor:

I found it very frustrating to see an article (Tuesday, Sept. 30, "The Honors College: Pulling a PROP 209 East Coast- style") that was almost a complete misrepresentation of the facts. Every item in the list of "Reasons to protest the Honors College" is disputable, and the author should have taken the time to research before writing such a damaging article.

To state that admission standards to the Honors College are based on SAT scores is totally false. To get into the Honors College, all one needs is a 3.2 GPA. No matter if one is African-American, white, female, male, Asian- American, rich, poor, or anything else, all one needs is a strong work ethic, a 3.2, and the initiative to go to the Honors office and fill out an application to benefit from the program.

The money for the Honors College has been earmarked specifically for that purpose and will not be taken away from any other resource on campus. If the Amherst campus didn't get the Honors College, another campus would have gotten the money.

Our campus is the one that needs the Honors College the most. The Honors Program has not been renovated, and it is bursting at the seams. The only space the Honors Program has is office space, and with over 1500 students, we need more than that.

Maybe the Honors College is a business venture, but it is one that will benefit all students on campus if we allow it to. It will give the University more classrooms, and will allow us to have more Honors classes, which anyone on campus can take. With the College, more non-honors students will have opportunities to take smaller, more in- depth courses.

Putting an article calling the Honors College racist and classist in the Multicultural Affairs section only accomplishes the opposite of what it wants to do. It pulls minority students away from the Honors Program, causing it to be predominantly white.

If we take full advantage of what the Honors College has to offer and make it as diverse as we can, it will cease to be just a business venture and will instead be an increasingly rich asset for the University as a whole.

Confessions of a red meat lover

Ribs, sirloins, roasts, tenderloins, steak tips... the words roll off my lips and set my mouth watering.

What to choose from the menu tonight? Chicken or fish? Vegetables or pasta? Why bother, when the ecstasy of red meat can be mine.

For this lover of all things fine, there is but one choice — red meat, done rare. Nothing else will satisfy the senses.

As the waitress approaches with dinner in hand, my fingers tighten around my fork, and my pulse quickens as the scent of freshly grilled meat wafts in the air.

My knife cuts cleanly through the red, tender flesh, spilling its sweet juices onto its neighboring potato.

I raise the first, glistening bite to my lips, savoring that gods' nectar which sends my senses reeling in anticipation.

The feel of that sweet bite on my tongue is a joy which never looses its intensity, no matter how often it is repeated.

Successive mouthfuls enliven every taste bud and send the blood pulsing through my arteries.

I slowly chew each piece, savoring the unparalled richness of flavor and unmistakable texture of flame-broiled beef.

Too quickly, it is finished, and I move on to the side dishes. If only this sensation could remain, if the luscious taste could stay on my lips and breath long after my meal has been consumed.

I relish the contentment of a full stomach and the knowledge that my primordial lust for meat has been satisfied.

As those who know me well know, there is no greater pleasure in my life than good food, good company and good wine. Nothing makes me happier than sharing food and thoughts with family and friends. There is something special and perhaps sacred in the sharing of food, and so much more in the sharing of good food.

No falafel or veggie burger will ever pass in my eyes as good food. Tofu is not a replacement for beef.

A salad, as a filet mignon, simply cannot tempt me in the same way.

Vegetables were always considered side dishes, for good reason — they are not a meal in themselves.

Anyone looking to get on my good side should NOT attempt to feed me couscous. Rather, take a lesson from my parents, who have a succulent roast beef (done rare, of course) waiting for me the moment I open my door.

Jimmy Buffet had it right when he sang, "Cheeseburger in Paradise."

And so, doctors and doomsayers be damned — long live red meat!

A guide to vegetarian events

Since 1977, people around the world have been observing World Vegetarian Day on Oct. 1. The day was launched by the North American Vegetarian Society nearly 20 years ago and has grown since then.

This year, Canada, Australia, India, Germany and the United Kingdom are just some of the many countries celebrating World Vegetarian Day.

And if a day isn't enough, the Vegetarian Society of the United Kingdom, the Toronto Vegetarian Association and several other groups have extended the festivities for the whole week.

In the past, Vegetarian Societies and groups around the world held buffets and public dinners. Other activities may include setting up informational tables at shopping centers and public libraries or asking non-vegetarians to try going meatless for a day.

A few years back, the entire month of October was declared "Reverence for Life" month — a take-off on the World Vegetarian Day.

Starting yesterday, there are many vegetarian events taking place in the Boston area. Among the major events being celebrated are:

- Oct. 2 — World Day for Farm Animals, birthday of Mohandas K. Gandhi
- Oct. 3 — Birthday of St. Francis, patron saint of animals

Also, Fridays are declared vegan at the Country Life Vegetarian Restaurant.

The month closes out on Oct. 26 with the Boston Vegetarian Food Festival at Bunker Hill Community College.

For more information on vegetarian events in Boston, call the Vegetarian Resource Center at (617) 625-3790.

For the love of vegetables

Seema Gangatirkar

I love vegetables.

I know it's not everyday someone comes out, without any shame, and admits her love of vegetables.

Most people cringe when they hear that dirty word. Vegetables. There's a smirk inherent in the word, I suppose, kind of like a shudder.

Kind of like a shivery "You eat those things?"

In all fairness, there are different categories of vegetables — each with a different coolness quotient.

On the low end of the spectrum, you've got vegetables like squash, pumpkin, broccoli or spinach. Then there are the stringy vegetables like celery or sprouts — which people either love or hate with a passion. Finally, there's this other group of vegetables made up of corn and peas and other small, round edible types, which you can swallow without really tasting.

But back to the main point. I don't care much what vegetables look like or taste like. For the most part (with the exception of pumpkin and squash), I love 'em all. I like looking at them, touching them, smelling them. Most of all, I like to eat them. And there you have my motivation and inspiration in life for being vegetarian.

I suppose it's wrong not to a have a "real" reason to be a vegetarian. Some vegetarians cite animal cruelty as a reason to denounce meat. Others come up with health reasons or how workers — especially in the poultry industry — are treated poorly. For a good measure or two, some people point out the various diseases (Mad Cow disease has made a bunch of converts on this point) that can be contracted by eating an infected animal of your choice.

There are all really good and valid reasons. Mine is simply that I grew up in a household with no meat in it and I prefer vegetables to anything else.

Most people give me a side-long look when I announce I'm a vegetarian.

"Like, what does that mean?" they ask.

"Well, you know, no meat or anything."

"You mean you don't eat fish?"

I don't understand where this conception of fish, turkey and chicken not being meat comes from.

It seems like there is the whole category of animals which aren't really animals once they are dead. In fact, it seems in some people's minds, once a chicken lands on your plate, it turns into a vegetable. Go figure.

After I explain that I don't eat fish or turkey (and try to stay away from chicken), the next question is practically a no-brainer.

"So, you eat tofu?"

There's something about tofu that's got people running scared the other way from this whole idea of being a vegetarian. For some reason, tofu has taken on mythical proportions as being the staple of a vegetarian's diet. I suppose tofu is squishy and made out of soybeans and that's the reason everyone is scared out of their minds.

Actually vegetarian food is very nutritious, filling and tasty. And there's definitely more to it than rabbit food and tofu. There are lots of different options, if you look hard enough for them. There is pasta, rice, couscous and of course, everyone's favorite — the garden burger.

But the whole point of trying something vegetarian is to be daring. Be crazy, walk on the wild side. Try something new and you may be pleasantly surprised.

A glimpse at Gurtu's new album

COURTESY DANIELA STALLINGER

Bob James

In last week's column, I introduced the "Alan Lomax Collection," a series of more than 15 discs being issued separately by Rounder Records, chronicling the works of the music collector and writer Alan Lomax, from the years 1947–1960. I also talked about the Prison Songs 2-volume series last week, from 1947–48. This week, we move to September 1959, when Lomax wandered onto a small farm in Como, Miss. and met one of the pioneers of the 1960s blues revival, Mississippi Fred McDowell.

Jazz/Blues Weekly
BY JOSHUA BOYD

McDowell, in his 50s then, had a very large repertoire in his head of old southern blues and folk ballads for Lomax. He also had a booming, powerful tenor and a polyrhythmic and dramatic guitar style. Part of this Lomax collection is Fred McDowell: The First Recordings (Rounder). With the help of his neighbor Miles Pritcher on churning rhythm guitar and his wife Annie Mae on the kazoo sounding "comb," he moves through boogie stuff like the opener "I'm Going Down The River," "Shake 'em On Down" and the blues standard "Good Morning Little Schoolgirl." There's also quieter Delta blues like the duet between Fred and Annie Mae on "Keep Your Lamps Trimmed And Burning" and the daughters of bluesman Sid Hemphill singing "When The Train Comes Along" in a real straight, cold tone.

Recently, we here at UMass were graced by the presence of Indian musician, Trilok Gurtu, the multi-instrumentalist/ composer of what can be known as World Jazz, which embraces American principles from the manifestations of jazz here, and rhythms, modes and styles of other music all around the world.

Gurtu's latest album The Glimpse (Silva Screen) continues his explorations of combining all the world's music into one genius sound. Here you have the upbeat, percussion-centered "1–2 Beaucoup," the minimal "A Ilho Do Caju," with its exotic acoustic guitar and minimal percussion by Gurtu, and "Future Heat," with its funky breakdowns and phrases stated on the ancient European wind instrument, the kaval. Also, on The Glimpse, which is dedicated to Gurtu's first Western Hemisphere employer Don Cherry, are beautiful resounding vocals by Jaya Deva, who also used to play with Cherry.

This week also continues my exploration into one of jazz's most pressing questions: Does contemporary jazz (a la Kenny G) have any place amongst other acoustic (be–bop and otherwise) or electric (categorized by funk–jazz groups like Medeski, Martin and Wood and Don Byron) jazz? This reporter thinks not.

Those acoustic and electric jazz ensembles that I talk about are usually music that is made for integrity, musical exploration or even just for fun. They hold up well and are sincere. Sting's lead guitarist and co–writer Dominic Miller decided he would make one of these contemporary jazz albums, namely First Touch (Earthbeat!), and one wishes he hadn't.

North Carolina trio puts out gutsy rock

SOUTHERN CULTURE ON THE SKIDS
Plastic Seat Sweat
DGC

Trax On Trax Off

Many years ago, in the mid–80s, this trio from North Carolina, who have always combined punk, rock, surf and rockabilly to create a truly original "white trash" sound and image that they thrive on, started out on the road. Since then they've won fans all over the country who love to shimmy their hips to this unique party music.

The new album, Plastic Seat Sweat, features gutsy rock ("Earthmover"), odd calypso ("The House Of Bamboo") and funky little ditties about "day old banana pudding," and carving up possums for dinner, as well as instrumentals and the prime track of the album, "40 Miles To Vegas" another relentless rocker. Some repetition amongst some of the few weaker songs hamper it, but it's a small price to pay for the great ones. B+

The displacement of tribal workers due to a dam project in India is the subject of a film to be screened tomorrow evening. The Forum of Progressive Artists (FOPA) will present Kaise Jeebo Re! (How do I survive!) at 7 p.m. in Thompson 102 at the University of Massachusetts.

In the past, FOPA has presented informative programs about Third World issues. Last year, FOPA showed a screening of the film, When Women Unite, a feature about the prohibition movement in India.

The Kaise Jeebo Re! is an 80 minute documentary in English about the effects of the Bargi Dam Project. The documentary was filmed by Anurag Singh and Jharna Jhaveri. Both directors will be on hand at tomorrow night's screening to discuss the project.

The film describes the uncertainty and destruction unleashed upon tribal people since the beginning of the dam projects. For example, the Bargi Dam completed in 1990, drowned 162 villages in the Jabalpur, Seoni and Mandala districts of Madhya Pradesh — a state in central India. The flooding effectively displaced the million people in the area, who depended on the land to make their living.

"When you dam a river, it submerges hectares of land," said Satish Kolluri, a graduate student in the communication department and a member of the FOPA. According to Kolluri, tribal people are "wedded to the land. They have a very different relationship" to the land.

The second part of the film focuses on how the people are struggling to participate in the economic developments caused by the dam.

The dam project has been the focus for development planners for the last 50 years, who have been searching for ways to harness the water. In 1979, the Narmada Water Disputes Tribunal awarded the clearance to build two major dams — the Narmada Sagar and the Sardar Sarovar.

Controversy and opposition hounded the project, as concerns grew and issues arose. Pressure began to build on international donors and finally Japan suspended its aid for generation equipment and the World Bank asked for a review of the project.

Currently, the dam project involves 29 major dams in Madhya Pradesh and one in the state of Gujarat. There are 135 medium dams and more than 3000 minor dams in MP also.

The directors used 200 hours of footage, shot over six years, to put the film together. The footage records the troubles of the people, but also their joys.

Currently, the directors are touring the country and are scheduled to show Kaise Jeebo Ro! at Harvard, Princeton, Yale and the Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

The film is an effective way to present the plight of people displaced in the name of modernization.

"[The film] will be an eye opener for people," Kolluri said.

Easy recipe for Indian chicken

I love ethnic food. I love to eat it and I love to cook it. When I go to an ethnic restaurant, I'm always trying to figure out how they made the things that I just can't seem to stop chowing.

At first I thought that they were using a lot of secret ingredients to which only they had access. I was also sure that they were using some tricky exotic cooking techniques or some kind of special equipment. Well, my fellow foodies, thank Julia, I was (for the most part) quite wrong.

I can't think of a better way to illustrate this to you than through the recipe for my Dorm room interpretation of a classic (and my favorite) Indian dish: Chicken Tika Masala.

For this recipe, I'm going to go right to the shelf of the convenience store and reach for a tin of Campbell's Tomato Soup (to use as the base for the sauce), some canned or frozen peas and a couple of those Half & Half or cream containers which are always sitting in a bowl next to the coffee station.

This is an extremely simple recipe; it's cheap, filling and best of all, it tastes great. Try it — you'll like it!

The Dorm Room Gourmet
by Louis Davis

Once again, whenever and whatever you're cooking, think safety (and flavor) first. Always have a fire extinguisher close by and be sure to provide for proper ventilation. Rock and boil!

Chicken Tika Masala

Ingredients

- 1 lb boneless, skinless chicken thighs (or breasts), cut into 1 1/2 inches cubes
- 1 onion, finely diced
- 1 Tbs minced garlic (fresh or prepared)
- 1 Tbs. minced ginger root (fresh or prepared)
- 3 Tbs. lemon juice
- 1 can Campbell's Tomato Soup
- 1/3 cup Half & Half or cream (feel free to substitute with 2/3 cup rice or soy milk if you are kosher or don't eat dairy — just skip the addition of the water)
- 1/3 cup water
- 1/2 cup frozen or canned peas
- 1 Tbs. olive oil
- 1 Tbs. butter (olive oil could be substituted for the butter)
- 2 tsp. curry powder
- 1 tsp. chili powder (or to taste)
- 1 tsp. paprika
- 1 tsp. cayenne (optional)
- 2 tsp. sugar or honey
- salt and pepper to taste

• Place cut up chicken in a bowl and combine with 1 tsp. curry powder, 1/2 tsp. chili powder, 1/2 tsp. paprika, a pinch of cayenne — if you like — and salt and pepper to taste. Mix well and let stand a few minutes.

• Preheat a large skillet over medium high heat. When it's hot, add first the olive oil and then butter (this keeps the butter from getting too brown).

• Add chicken to the skillet in a single layer, making sure not to crowd the pan. After the pieces have browned on one side, flip them over with tongs or a fork to brown on the other side. Don't fiddle with the pan while the chicken is browning. This is no time for stirring or tossing; that will prevent the formation of a nice crisp exterior.

• When browned evenly on both sides, remove the chicken from the pan and set aside, leaving the oil in the bottom of the pan to cook the rest of the ingredients.

• Add the onions to the skillet and cook until soft (about 5 minutes). Next add the ginger, garlic and the rest of the spices plus a little salt and pepper (this allows the spices to toast in the oil and releases their full flavor). Cook this mixture for 2 to 3 minutes, constantly stirring to prevent burning. Turn the heat down a little if it is too hot.

• Add the lemon juice and stir well, scraping the bottom of the pan to remove the brown stuff that has formed. This is called deglazing the pan and is used to get all the flavor possible out of the pan and into the dish.

• Add the soup straight from the can and add about 1/4 of a can full of water and stir to incorporate. Put the Half & Half in a cup and microwave it for one minute. Then add it to the pan with the sugar. Stir gently to incorporate and bring the sauce to a slow simmer.

• Add the peas to the sauce, then add the precooked chicken. Mix it all together and allow to just simmer until it is a smooth sauce. If it's too thick, adjust with a little water or Half & Half. Pour Into a serving bowl and enjoy!

Serving suggestion

This dish is best presented over rice — white Basmati rice is the best and you can find it in most major supermarkets! And, just add (for Basmati or even plain rice) 1/2 tsp. of ground cardamom and a tablespoon of butter to the salted rice water before cooking and you will have a very Indian tasting grain, which goes great with the flavors in this dish.

■ jazz

Not that he hadn't made an album at all — he's not a bad guitarist, he definitely knows what he is doing — but that he his art be sold to the elevator music crowd. There is even a note on the back cover of the CD case saying how this is the perfect music for that tender candlelight dinner. So, despite the promising percussive strummimg on "Rush Hour," First Touch's other songs are too echoey, too New Agey to stand up with more sincere jazz. You'll be hearing tunes from First Touch in elevators in not too long.

Also, another musician who's taken the "contemporary jazz sell-out," who's been around for quite a while now, (since the 60s) is pianist Bob James, who has recently put out his new album Playin' Hooky (Columbia). His well- spaced phrasing and soft piano echoes that of an early Herbie Hancock or Bill Evans, but the setting he places that piano in is the same you might hear in the back of a Michael Bolton song.

Programmed drums and synthesizers pollute this album, not to mention the over-effected saxophones by a guy named Boney James pollute this otherwise good effort by James. Also, Blue Note artist Fareed Haque lends some strong nylon string guitar to the album. I would definitely think that a duo album, with no gimmicks (throw away the synthesizers and turn down that reverb) would be great to hear between James and Haque.

Bowie reinvents some old songs

David Bowie performed at the Orpheum Tuesday night

By Marty Keane

DAVID BOWIE
Orpheum Theatre
Sept. 30

BOSTON — After 1989's Sound+Vision extravaganza, David Bowie swore to never again play his older tunes in concert. Thankfully, he lied.

In a flawless performance to a packed-and-then-some house at the Orpheum Theatre, the Thin White Duke masterfully integrated both the past and present in a concert that can only be described as breathtaking.

Alternating newer material from his last two releases with timeless gems from the '60s and '70s, Bowie lived up to his reputation as rock's ultimate chameleon. He has managed to stay artistically relevant by consistently confounding the expectations placed on him and on Tuesday he showed why.

Playfully prancing about the stage like a giddy schoolboy, Bowie showed no signs of his age. While his physical appearance, youthful enthusiasm and renewed vigor suggest the traits of a man half his age, Bowie (now 50) pulls no punches, and enjoys doing it. Barely holding in this exuberance, he proudly wore a beaming smile stretched clear across his chiseled face as he traded laughs with the crowd.

Strolling on stage in a simple outfit consisting of a button-down shirt and tailored pants with only an acoustic guitar, Bowie opened the evening by warmly reminiscing his drug- fueled glory days of the late '60s and early '70s.

"Quicksand," a woefully forgotten gem off 1971's Hunky Dory was played with a refreshing degree of restraint, as was 1968s "The Supermen," from The Man Who Sold The World. Clearly, both these obscure tunes have withstood the test of time and still sound fresh — even two decades later.

When he did play the "hits," he reworked them with brilliant and inventive new arrangements that added ingenious sonic textures and made ample use of his crack backing band: bassist Gail Ann Dorsey, drummer Zachary Alford, keyboardist Mike Garson and guitarist Reeves Gabrels. So much for lazily riding off into the sunset.

"Fashion" had a jazzy swing missing from the studio version, "Scary Monsters (And Super Creeps)" was deftly augmented by Garson's pulsating keyboards and Alford's propulsive kit work, and the timeless "The Jean Genie" began in a bluesy riff-trading jam and ended with a joyous foot-stomping trip down memory lane.

Announcing a song "Written in 1966, but not by me," Bowie and Gabrels played the instantly recognizable first chords of the Velvet Underground's "Waiting For The Man" — one of rock's defining songs. He would again cover VU on a transcendent version of "White Light, White Heat."

The new songs — among them "Seven Years In Tibet," "I'm Afraid of Americans" and "Hallo Spaceboy" (featuring a screen flashing images of psychedelia juxtaposed against a claustrophobic soundscape) — merely reinforced Bowie's hallmark traits — progressive and experimental artistic vision.

Closing with "All The Young Dudes" (a song he wrote for Mott The Hoople), the song's title said it all. David Bowie — at least for these two hours — was a young dude once again.

Whitney Houston prepares for concert

By David Bauder
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Sleekly dressed in a white evening gown, it's an elegant Whitney Houston pictured in HBO promotional materials for her live televised concert this Sunday.

Backstage, life is a little less glamorous: She's fighting off a cold, her daughter demands attention, days of rehearsals beckon and there's an interview to be done, never one of her favorite activities anyway.

Her mind flashes back to youthful summer days spent traveling on concert tours with her cousin, Dionne Warwick, one of the singers Houston will pay tribute to on Sunday.

"You see the glamour and the glitz in the front, but in the background, you know what it takes to put on all the glamour and the glitz," she said.

Houston's dusting off several of her own hits to go along with tributes to Warwick, Aretha Franklin and Diana Ross for the 90-minute special, broadcast live from Washington, D.C.'s Constitution Hall on the East Coast at 9 p.m. It will be on tape delay in other time zones at 9 p.m.

The concert promises to be a scaled-down, more musical experience than her two previous HBO specials, welcoming Desert Storm troops home in March 1991 and paying tribute to South Africa and Nelson Mandela in November 1994.

Houston hasn't toured in the mainland United States for the past three years, so it will be the first time many of her fans have seen her in a while.

"I like the intimacy of it," she said. "I wanted it to be more intimate, rather than large, which I'm used to playing. I just thought it would be a great atmosphere."

Besides, she said, "they're paying me a lot of money." The concert will also benefit the Children's Defense Fund.

Plans are to perform Warwick's "Walk on By," Diana Ross' "Ain't No Mountain High Enough" and "Ain't No Way" as a tribute to Aretha Franklin. Houston also plans to sing "Summertime" from Porgy and Bess and some gospel material.

"It will be a setting of just basic, classic songs with voice," she said. Warwick "has known me before I knew myself," she said. "It's difficult to talk about someone who is your family and also talk about them in the realm of a popular songstress. Dionne just taught me so much about grace and style."

Showtime movie gives Holocaust heros tribute

By Lynn Elber
Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — History, when examined closely enough, has an unnerving way of reminding us how much we belong to the past. That was the case for director Peter Bogdanovich when he took on a television film about two Holocaust heroes who risked their lives to save the few they could from Nazi extermination.

He was initially drawn to "Rescuers: Stories of Courage — Two Women" because the true accounts of a Polish Catholic housekeeper who shielded a Jewish boy and of a French Resistance member glorified women.

The film, the first of three dramas from Barbra Streisand's production company about non-Jews who aided Nazi Germany's victims, debuts 8 p.m. on Sunday on cable's Showtime.

"I really loved the material," Bogdanovich said of the scripts drawn from the book Rescuers: Portraits of Moral Courage in the Holocaust by Gay Block and Malka Drucker.

"They sent me five or six different stories, and I read them all and got to pick. I said 'Let me do the ones about the women, because that interests me most the most.'

"I tend to gravitate toward those kind of stories," said the director of The Last Picture Show and Mask, adding: "Maybe it's perversity, because most movies are about guys. I'm tired of that."

During filming in Canada, Bogdanovich's professional interest turned personal.

"I never thought about it until I was doing these two stories, but it turns out I'm one of the rescued," he said. In 1939, Bogdanovich's Jewish Austrian mother was pregnant with him and living in Yugoslavia.

Bogdanovich's father, who was Greek Orthodox, recognized the German threat and managed to arrange visas for the family and for his wife's closest relatives. They fled to New York on the pretext of a World's Fair visit.

Shortly after their arrival, in July 1939, Bogdanovich was born. His mother's relatives who didn't escape Europe were killed.

"It did give (the film) special resonance," Bogdanovich said.

"When we were making it, I felt a kind of intensity about the story. Those Nazi uniforms walking around — I'd kind of have to hold myself back from wanting to throw a stone at them."

Like Schindler's List, Steven Spielberg's acclaimed film about unlikely savior Oskar Schindler, "Rescuers" illuminates small chapters of a vast tragedy.

These are unlikely heroes who helped when reason or fear should have prevented it.

In the first of the dramas paired under the "Rescuers" umbrella, Elizabeth Perkins (Big) plays the housekeeper, Gertruda Babilinska, who agrees to protect and raise a Jewish child as her own in occupied Poland.

Babilinska rises to the task, shielding young Mickey from the Nazis as well from himself as he becomes increasingly disconnected from his Jewish roots.

"Woman on a Bicycle" stars Sela Ward ("Sisters") as Marie-Rose Gineste, an unmarried, unsophisticated woman who lives a quiet life working for a Catholic priest in the small town of Montauban, France.

But when called on by the priest to help Jewish refugees, she responds and becomes an unwavering supporter of the French Resistance. Gineste takes on a greater risk by hiding a Jewish family she sees flee a death camp-bound boxcar.

Although a few dramatic liberties were taken, such as combining minor characters, Bogdanovich says the stories are consistent with real events.

"I was told just yesterday that the boy in the Polish story, the real person named Michael, saw the show and was very, very moved, and thought it was very accurate," Bogdanovich said.

"ER" restores faith in the live concept

By Frazier Moore
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Coming up tonight, a television event! Every second... every breath ... every moment: "ER" on film!

Forget "ER's" fling last week with live TV. This time, film will banish all risk. Remove all doubt. Cut out any dead time. Weed out every glitch.

Best of all, this "ER" episode (on film!) will be televised to viewers in the Eastern time zone, then, three hours later, be seen by the West Coast audience... and both performances will be exactly the same!

If we're honest with ourselves, this is what we wanted from "ER" all along, and what we prefer from almost any TV show: comfort. We viewers are roughing it when we watch live TV, and we prefer our creature comforts.

For instance, the comfort of knowing a show is in the can, all the wrinkles ironed out, a done deal before we ever get a glimpse. This brings up an exception that proves the rule: "Saturday Night Live," which, live from New York, began its 23rd season last weekend. The live-ness of "Saturday Night Live" has long since ceased to be an argument for live TV, and the season opener — predictable and plodding — didn't argue for it once again.

Rather than challenging itself (and the viewer), "SNL's" live-ness continues to serve as its excuse for not being better, to justify the self-indulgence of a series whose weekly unpreparedness ensures that it not only isn't ready for prime time each Saturday, but usually seems a day or two short of being ready for airing in any network daypart.

At some point years and years ago, "SNL," irrespective of its live-ness, became a done deal. Ever since, it's coasted as a comfortable, if seldom funny, encore of its long-ago self.

But this is not to say that there is no room on TV for breaks from pre-recorded programming.

One reason for live TV is to plug the viewer into an emerging situation, like a major-league game or a Bronco chase or an Oscar telecast. To watch something important broadcast live is to be in synch with its meaning as it unfolds.

The other justification is live TV's potential for defying the sense of order most TV has become. Just as we might have once watched "SNL" with the unexpressed longing that something might go terribly awry (of course, the only thing that does with any frequency is the comedy), we watched "ER's" live episode part-hoping for a major goof we could chortle over forever.

But there weren't any goofs worth mentioning. Last week's pair of live "ER" performances (for the East and West coasts) were both remarkably glitch-free. This may have contributed to viewer unrest.

Oh, sure, the audience was huge for Live "ER" (as NBC branded it). In fact, it edged out "Dallas" 1980 "Who shot J.R.?" episode as the most-watched season premiere of any drama in TV history. In what became a self-fulfilling prophesy for the NBC hype machine, Live "ER" was vaulted to the level of an event: An event-size audience tuned in.

But ever since, viewers and critics alike have been grousing about what they saw. Not unlike complaining that a zebra isn't a horse, detractors grumbled that Live "ER" was ... well, different from the filmed "ER" they love every week. Not so polished. Not so fast-paced. Not so free to careen through space and time. Somehow lost in the fault-finding was recognition of the show's heroic cheekiness just in mounting a live effort: No series is more dependent on sophisticated post-production techniques (which can include computer-generated effects, rapidfire editing, and almost anything else the mind can imagine and the eye see). The very essence of "ER" depends on the bag of tricks it set aside to go live.

And going live, "ER" also recognized the restrictions of time and space — even as it stretched those constraints to ambitious new lengths.

But when all is said and done, it wasn't film. It wasn't tape. Live "ER" was live. And live can seldom satisfy us hyper-stimulated viewers, our nerve endings conditioned as they are to the hopped-up tempo of rock videos, cola commercials or — come to think of it — a typical filmed episode of "ER."

For a TV audience hooked on the ever-more-concentrated, ever-more-eye-popping visual experience, how can live TV compete? It can't, any more than life can. Besides, isn't TV meant to improve on ordinary real life?

It better. Or we might get bored with the show we're watching. Behold our itchy trigger fingers poised to resume our channel-surfing at any time.

We're mighty restless these days. TV helped make us that way.

"48 HOURS:" Ten years ago at Christmastime, an intruder entered SueZann Bosler's house, murdered her father and then almost killed her. She has since waged a crusade for justice, but, incredibly, for her that has meant saving the life of the convicted killer, James Bernard Campbell. For more than a year, CBS News' "48 Hours" has followed this woman's crusade to save her father's killer. The report airs tonight at 10 p.m. EDT, as correspondent Susan Spencer joins Bosler in her former home north of Miami, where she relives how she watched Campbell stab her father and then turn on her. Saving Campbell's life, says Bosler, is the best way to memorialize her father, a minister who did not believe in the death penalty. Nor does Bosler, who says that today she has forgiven Campbell for what he did. "48 Hours" is anchored by Dan Rather.

Metropolitan tries to broaden repertory

Manager Volpe tries a bit of new and old in coming seasons

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK — The Metropolitan Opera, always faced with criticism that it's too conservative, says it's trying to respond.

Much of the audience wants to see the central Verdi-Puccini-Wagner repertoire repeated night after night after night in sets that are as realistic and opulent as possible. A smaller segment wants to see other works and avant-garde productions, a regular feature of European houses.

"We're now at a turning point," Met general manager Joseph Volpe says. "This is an interesting year, and somewhat of an experimental year. We have 25 operas, more than we normally would present. We do not have performances of Aida, Boheme, Figaro, Rigoletto, Tosca or Traviata, which for the Met is probably a first."

This season, which opened Sept. 22 with Carmen, includes the Met premieres of Rossini's La Cenerentola and Strauss' Capriccio, and the first Met performances of Stravinsky's The Rake's Progress since the 1953-54 season.

Next season will have the Met debuts of Floyd's Susannah, and Schoenberg's Moses und Aron. The 1999-2000 season has the first Met performances of Lehar's The Merry Widow and the world premiere of John Harbison's The Great Gatsby.

Busoni's Dr. Faust and Prokofiev's The Gambler are performed by the Met for the first time in 2000-01, and Prokofiev's War and Peace is added the following season. New operas commissioned from Tobias Picker and Tam Dun are scheduled to have their premieres by 2005.

"It takes 10 years in an institution such as the Met to accomplish anything, or to turn things around or to start in a direction," Volpe said, quoting something conductor Herbert von Karajan once said to him.

Volpe, starting his eighth season, knows what his mission is: broaden the repertory without affecting income. Berg's Wozzeck, one of the artistic highlights of last season, was a box-office bath. There were empty seats on opening night, and audience members continually were walking out during performances.

Robert Carsen's production of Eugene Onegin, set on a white stage instead of opulent Romanov Russia, was booed at its opening last season, loved by some, hated by others.

Robert Wilson, known for provocative, modernistic designs, makes his debut this March in Wagner's Lohengrin. Judging from a photo taken during a technical rehearsal, it's sure to be controversial, the opposite of the Met's super-realistic Ring, Tannhauser and Parsifal, which follow nearly all of Wagner's design directions.

Last season, the Met sold 92 percent of its tickets and has a $117,000 surplus. It forecasts a $1 million loss as part of a $160 million budget this season based on a projection of 91 percent tickets sold. Each 1 percent means $700,000.

"The money won't keep up with our plans and ideas," Volpe said.

The Dr. Faust will be a co-production with the Salzburg Festival, where Met artistic director James Levine will conduct it in July 1999, and the Susannah is borrowed from the Chicago Lyric Opera and the Houston Grand Opera. Volpe hopes to borrow costumes from the Kirov Opera In Russia, the home company of Valery Gergiev, the Met's new principal guest conductor.

"For years, the Met would never co-produce anything only because we felt we wanted it to be our own production," Volpe said. "Now that we're really expanding the repertory, we don't have that option. I think we have to co-produce. We have to find ways to do more things and spend more money."

A constant complaint of subscribers is the lack of great outside conductors, a move the Met tried to address with the hiring of Valery Gergiev as principal guest conductor. Kurt Masur, Zubin Mehta, Giuseppe Sinopoli and Seiji Ozawa are among the conductors Volpe would like to come to the Met. But Sinopoli has stayed away since 1988. Ozawa since 1992. Sir Georg Solti had been scheduled to lead the Met for the first time in 30 years with a concert next spring, but he died of a heart attack on Sept. 3 at age 84.

Carlos Kleiber, last at the Met in 1990 and now semiretired, is being wooed to take over Solti's Met performances. But it's hard to get many conductors to leave Europe, where they can get from one opera house to another in less than two hours.

So the Met is concentrating on singers, cultivating a group of young Americans whom Volpe and Levine hope can fill the seats in the next decade, when star tenors Luciano Pavarotti and Placido Domingo probably will retire.

Volpe outlined much of the major casting for the next few years. Jerry Hadley will join Renee Fleming and Samuel Ramey in Susannah, and Vladimir Chernov will join Angela Gheorghiu and Roberto Alagna in a new production of Verdi's La Traviata during the 1998-99 season.

Hadley, Dawn Upshaw and Dwayne Croft have been cast in the world premiere of The Great Gatsby, which Levine will conduct in December 1999.

Domingo and Frederica von Stade will headline The Merry Widow, which Andrew Davis will conduct and will be sung in English. The new production of Tristan und Isolde that season, which features Jane Eaglen, Ben Heppner and Levine, will be designed by Jurgen Rose and directed by Dieter Dorn.

Braves defeats Astros in division opener

ATLANTA (AP) — This time, it wasn't close.

In the first blowout between the teams this year, the Atlanta Braves took advantage of eight walks by Mike Hampton and again shut down "The Killer Bs," routing the Houston Astros 13-5 yesterday to move within a victory of their sixth straight NL championship series.

In 11 regular-season games between the Braves and Astros, the margin of victory was never more than two runs — a trend that continued in Game 1 of the division series when Atlanta won 2-1 behind Greg Maddux.

"This was a little bit fluky," second baseman Tony Graffanino said. "It will probably be close next time we play."

It better be for the Astros' sake. The Braves, who got a three-run homer from Jeff Blauser, lead the best-of-5 series 2-0 and can finish off Houston with a victory tomorrow at the Astrodome. "It's nice to be two-up, but it's like investing," Blauser said. "You're not guaranteed results tomorrow because of what happened yesterday and today. We have to push on and punch them out."

Hampton, who had only two walks in 17 innings during his final two starts of the regular season, walked four in the first four innings and got worse after getting two outs in the fifth. With the score 3-all, he threw 16 balls in an 18-pitch span, resulting in consecutive walks to Chipper Jones, Fred McGriff, Javy Lopez and Andruw Jones, forcing home the go-ahead run. Hampton, who threw only 38 strikes in 87 pitches, was replaced by Mike Magnante, who gave up a two-run single to pinch-hitter Greg Colbrunn that made it 6-3.

Colbrunn's hit ended an 0-for-25 postseason slump by Atlanta pinch-hitters, dating back to the '95 World Series.

"I was just trying to be a little too perfect and it wound up costing me," Hampton said. "I probably just tried to nibble too much."

Atlanta added five runs in the sixth — four unearned — once again striking with two outs. Fred McGriff had an RBI single and two more scored when first baseman Jeff Bagwell let a high throw deflect off his glove for an error. Danny Bautista followed with a two-run single, though the inning mercifully ended for the Astros when he was thrown out trying to stretch it to a double.

It has been a miserable series for Bagwell, who had 43 homers, 135 RBIs and 31 stolen bases during the regular season. He is 0-for-8 with five strikeouts, including three yesterday. "Obviously, it's a little disappointing," he said. "But you've got to shrug it off and go get 'em Friday."

Craig Biggio, Derek Bell and Bagwell, the top three hitters in the Astros order, have become The Killer Zs, snoozing through the series at a combined 1-for-25 with no RBIs. They've even been outhit by the Houston pitchers, who are 3-for-4.

"It just happens to be part of baseball," said Biggio, who has the trio's only hit, a meaningless infield single in the ninth yesterday. "Guys go into funks."

"That could change in a day, in an at-bat," Bagwell added. "It could happen Friday."

WNBA moves into Motown and D.C.

NEW YORK (AP) — Detroit and Washington are joining the WNBA. The two cities were awarded expansion franchises today, increasing the size of the league to 10 teams, with plans calling for two new teams per season for the next several years.

"Because the interest in the WNBA's inaugural season exceeded our expectations at every level, the operating committee felt a two-year phased expansion plan was appropriate," WNBA president Val Ackerman said. "Detroit and Washington will bring top management experience and state-of-the-art facilities to women's professional basketball."

Nicknames and logos have not yet been chosen for the Detroit and Washington franchises, which beat out Orlando, Fla., in the selection process. The teams will be operated by the NBA's Detroit Pistons and Washington Wizards.

The franchises were granted on the condition that they each secure pledges for at least 3,000 season tickets before Nov. 10. If the NBA Board of Governors approves the expansion, the WNBA champion Houston Comets would switch to the five-team Western Conference, joining Los Angeles, Phoenix, Sacramento and Utah. The new teams would join the Eastern Conference with New York, Charlotte and Cleveland.

Still to determined is which team will acquire the services of Nikki McCray, a 1996 Olympian who was the MVP of the ABL last season while averaging 19.9 points for the Columbus Quest, who won the championship. McCray agreed to join the WNBA last month. Detroit was one of the original markets targeted by the WNBA before its inaugural season, but officials with the Palace of Auburn Hills decided to wait and see how the league fared. Washington also wanted to have one of the eight original franchises, but the league wanted to wait until the new arena in downtown Washington — to open in early December — was ready. Similar arena questions have kept the WNBA from placing franchises in Atlanta and Toronto.

With other teams in New York, Cleveland, Salt Lake City, Phoenix, Sacramento and Charlotte, the WNBA drew more than 1 million fans over the summer as the eight teams averaged 9,669 spectators a game.

The rival ABL begins its second season Oct. 12.

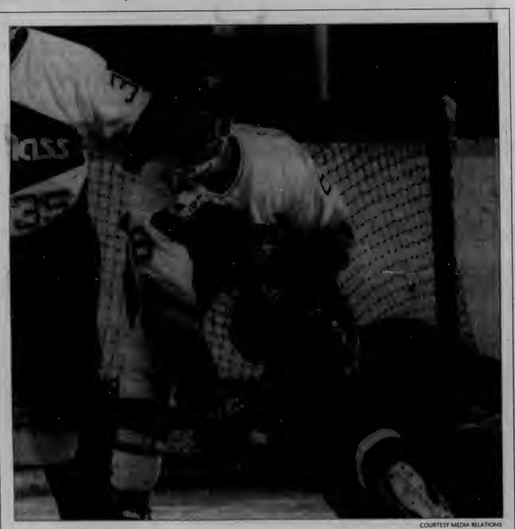
For years upon years, John Chaney's Temple basketball teams have played in McGonigle Hall. The venerable old barn holds 3,900 rowdy, screaming, faithful fans. Make that held. This year, the Owls — who deserve a beautiful, new arena — move into the Apollo at Temple. The new building will seat thousands, bring in millions and hopefully have rest rooms that fans can get to and back before half-time ends (a feature sorely lacking at McGonigle).

But there won't be the same aura. There won't be the closeness people felt cramped next to each other, the pride alumni who played there radiated.

McGonigle was like UMass' Curry Hicks Cage. It was home, an unforgettable home. But the team, and the athletic department, outgrew it.



Don't get me wrong, most of these new stadiums and buildings are the technological wonders they claim to be. More comfortable seating, better locker rooms and field facilities, funky new stadium screens.

But that history is missing. And not being able to experience it is like going to Yellowstone National Park after its horrible fires. You know you missed something, something beautiful and important. But you'll never know its true extent.

This week, they took a wrecking ball to Boston Garden.

I've never been to the Garden, and now I never will. I can sadly say that I've missed something wonderful.

UMass GLBT community alive

Congratulations GLBT! After several years of sleeping at the wheel it seems as if we are finally onto something. In fact, it seems as if the GLBT community is active for the first time since I came here.

I eagerly arrived as a transfer student at UMass two years ago. Having come from a very conservative area in Arizona, I was thrilled to come to a university which seemed to have so much to offer. The LBGA at Northern Arizona University received no university funding, had little support and faced homophobia at every turn. The community there was small, but close-knit. Our entire budget came from dues that were paid by the GLBT students at the beginning of each semester.

UMass was made out to be a center of sorts for gay folks. With the Stonewall Center, LBGA (which carries quite a hefty budget) and the 2 and 20 Special Interest Residential Program, what could go wrong?

Everything.

My roommate brought me to my first LBGA meeting and there was nothing. People left as soon as they could. The LBGA consisted of mostly white males and no one seemed to notice that it was problematic. There were no activities. No political action. Nothing. I went to an LBGA dance a couple of times only to watch four people on the dance floor. The queer community often seemed catty and unwelcoming, to say the least. Last semester, there was no Queer Fest. I was left to ask myself, with so many resources, why has the GLBT community been so disjoined and apathetic for the past couple of years?

Well, a lot of folks must have been scratching their heads at the same time because this year, something good is happening. After being here for only one month this academic year, the GLBT community has accomplished more than I have seen in my past two years put together.

Already, many people have been coming to Pride Alliance meetings (formerly known as the LBGA) and coming back (a new tradition for many of us). The Concerned Students for Civil Rights have organized and rallied support for a successful protest. National Coming Out Day has been expanded to a week of activities. A Coming Out Group is up and running. Three months ago, I couldn't imagine the queer community so active. To all those who have been active, pat yourself on the back!

What happened to change all that apathy from years past? Foremost, I think there is far more of a community than there ever has been. Lines of communication are open between resources. Queer-peer educators, Pride and Heritage, the Pride Alliance, the Stonewall Center, the Concerned Students for Civil Rights and the Two and Twenty floor seem to be communicating and there are things to do! Most importantly, there have been active, involved, and vocal students (hats off to the freshman class, especially).

After being here for only one month this academic year, the GLBT community has accomplished more than I have seen in my past two years put together.

Katie Thoennes

What next? The whole community has a lot of work yet to do. We need to reach out to more people. Not only on campus, but in the whole area, including the high schools. Coalitions need to be built to other organizations, especially to ALANA communities. Activities have yet to be planned (World AIDS Day and preparations for Queer Fest). Articles have yet to be written for the Collegian. There is no excuse for complacency.

Though many students feel that this area is very gay friendly, I would argue that homophobia is still alive and kicking. It was only a week ago that I was insultingly called a "dyke" for the first time. I was trying to help a woman who had just received a death threat because she was a lesbian. It happened on her first day of work. It happened in the Campus Center. It happens all the time. We have the power to change it.

So, we're off to a good start, UMass. For more information, the Pride Alliance Meetings are at 7 p.m. on Tuesdays in the Campus Center. Feel free to come or stop by the Pride Alliance office in the Student Union. You don't even have to pay dues.

Katie Thoennes is a UMass student.

In and Out closes in on GLBT issues

By Jesse Burchfield
Collegian Correspondent

IN AND OUT
Directed by Frank Oz with Kevin Klein, Tom Selleck, Matt Dillon
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

In the recently released In and Out, the film industry takes a sharp turn from the gay characters which have plagued our big screens in the last few years. Instead of a flamboyant gay neighbor or a gay character completely drawn from gay stereotypes, this film sets a foundation for comically looking at events in the life of gay characters without insulting the community which serves as the source of the material.

In and Out was inspired by the acceptance speech for best actor that Oscar winner Tom Hanks received for the film Philadelphia. During the speech, Hanks revealed that his high school drama teacher was gay, in a heartfelt appeal for tolerance. During the speech, a gay screenwriter in the audience, Paul Rudnick, began to brainstorm.

The product of Rudnick's brainstorming is the lighthearted romantic comedy In and Out. In the film, Kevin Klein plays a rather reserved and somewhat anal retentive literature teacher in a small Midwestern high school. The opening pan of the town reveals a slice of the imaginary "Leave it to Beaver Americana," which is soon to be challenged by the outing of one of its own.

Thrilled with the possibility of a former citizen winning an Oscar, the townspeople rally around their television sets as a former Klein student (Matt Dillon) wins an award for his performance as a melodramatic gay war hero. During his speech, Dillon thanks his former literature teacher while not forgetting to add, "...and he's gay." Subsequently, the entire town becomes engulfed in sexual speculation.

While this part of the film opens itself to the opportunity for dreary repetitive dialogue, snaps must be given to the editor for saving us from the chore. Instead, what follows are original and funny moments of a town trying to deal with a reshuffling of their normally sleepy lives.

Joan Cusack, playing the role as Klein's love interest and soon to be wife, takes us on an enjoyable romp through her chemically imbalanced little world. Artfully overdone, Cusack's character displays an aspect of the coming-out process which is often painful. The distress of being sucked into a relationship based on lies not only allows the movie watcher to understand the pain caused by one coming out, as well as the pain caused when one doesn't come out fast enough.

Fortunately, not even prozac and twinkies can help her win her man; especially when her sexual competition is played by Tom Selleck. Entering the story as a "Geraldo-like" character after a hyped-up news piece about Klein, Selleck soon reveals his own homosexuality. Fresh off the "Friends" bandwagon, Selleck gives a surprisingly subtle performance, which serves the film well.

The combination of a good cast, which includes great performances by Debbie Reynolds (Mother), Wilfred Brimley (Father) and Bob Newhart (Principal), and well written dialogue creates a light and tastefully done comedy.

To all students who have not graced South Hadley's anwser to the cineplex to see this film, In and Out is well worth the trip.

Before I take my leave, I would like to slip off the shoes of Ebert and mount my soapbox. For once in my life, I would like to see someone make a film in which the plot is not merely "being gay." As a gay man, there happens to be a variety of facets to my life. I'm a student, an activist, a Buddhist nun, Neil Diamond impersonator, and a bad movie reviewer. The film I would like to propose is about a gay president who is held hostage on a gay parade float by a scraggly group of well-armed Ralph Reed separatists who demand the impossible. Their demand list would include having television producers use movie magic to eradicate Pat Robertson's third chin; condoms to be sold only with wedding bands; Jimmy Swaggart be allowed to explain that, like Eddie Murphy, he was only trying to advise prostitutes as to the error of their ways and that "Touched by an Angel" and reruns of "Hee-Haw" be played on every major network five nights a week.

Stonewall exposed

Hey! You know that place over in Southwest? You know... Crampton? Well, there is this really great place located in Crampton called the Stonewall Center. You are probably thinking, "What the hell does that place have to offer little old me?" Well guess what? I'm going to tell you!

The Stonewall Center was established in the fall of 1985 to "serve the diversity of the lesbian, bisexual, gay and transgender community of students, faculty, staff and local residents," according to the Stonewall Center Brochure.

So, I'll cut to the chase and get down to some of the great things this place does! First, there is the Speaker's Bureau, which is a group of speakers trained to talk to various groups on and off campus about GLBT issues.

Second, there is a GLBT Study Lecture Series that features weekly seminars on many different relevant topics.

Elana Mendelson

There are also workshops and programs, such as a monthly GLBT Cafe Series, concerts, poetry readings, theater and much more! Another wonderful aspect of the center is the resources like the lending library of literature and videos, computer database of GLBT resources in the Pioneer Valley, the Stonewall Center Web Site and the monthly newsletter, the "Blatant."

Okay. Now we know the general stuff about the Stonewall Center, so we can move onto things that are going on in the upcoming months...

Jason Heffner will be presenting: Practicing Queer Social-Change: Reclaiming focus on how we want to go as a movement on Oct. 16 in Campus Center Room 803 at 12:30 p.m.. On October 23, Cindy Beal, Master of Divinity, will be discussing The Keepers of Right and Wrong: Homophobia and the Christian Right in Room 805-9 in the Campus Center. At the end of October, Alison Bechdel, the creator of the comic strip, Dykes To Watch Out For, will speak on Assimilation and its Discontents: Chronicling Fin-de-Siecle Queer Culture.

In November and December, keep an eye out for lectures featuring Deb Carling, Betsey Reed, Amy Hoffman, Christian Ewen and other speakers to be announced at a later date.

To make a long story short, there are tons of things going on in the Stonewall Center this semester, so keep your eyes peeled! Please call the center to get the whole scoop. They are really friendly and would love to talk with you!

So... give them a call at (413) 545-4824, or drop in anytime Monday through Friday, from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m.

Support Red Cross?

In the last two weeks, there has been a lot of discussion and debate in the college community over the exclusion of gay and bisexual men, or anyone who has had intercourse with a gay or bisexual man, from donating blood. This rule was put into place by the FDA in 1983, two years before the introduction of testing for HIV. The rule excludes anyone who has had sex with a gay or bisexual man since 1977 from donating blood. That was before the vast majority of people attending this college were sexually active and before some were even born.

There are many different reasons given by the American Red Cross for this exclusion. There is the fact that the highest reported rate of AIDS in this country is still among gay and bisexual men. However, they neglect to say that the highest reported rate of increase is among heterosexual men. They neglect to say that all blood donated must be tested for HIV. They neglect to say that this rule was made by the FDA before there was even a test for HIV.

Saul Accetta

There are many in the Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, Transgender Ally (GLBTA) community who believe that if they protest the gathering of blood on campus by the American Red Cross, they will force the Red Cross to lodge an official protest against the FDA and the outdated rule regarding gay and bisexual men. The belief of the GLBTA community is that the Red Cross has a lot more political clout than a small group of students within the Five College Consortium and that it would be much more productive to demonstrate against the Red Cross than to try to protest the regulation directly to the FDA.

The new group, Concerned Students for Civil Rights (CSCR), has known about this rule for a while and student groups at other universities in the Five College Consortium have also tried to change this policy through a dialogue with the Red Cross and have been unable to affect any outward signs of movement.

The Pride Alliance (formerly the LBGA) has voted to support the CSCR in their fight for change in the FDA regulations regarding the collection of blood for hospital use. Whether or not members of the Pride Alliance support the way in which the CSCR are going about this protest, the majority do support getting this outdated rule struck from the FDA regulations.

Whether or not you, as an individual on this campus, support the fight against the FDA's regulation, the fact is that the regulation is affecting the Red Cross's ability to collect blood for use in hospitals.

America has a severe need for blood. Hospitals around the nation are running on only a two-day supply. Should there be a large catastrophe, there is a possibility that hospitals in need could run out of blood and people could die as a result.

I am not saying that lifting the blood donation ban regarding anyone who has had intercourse with a gay or bisexual man will solve this problem. However, it should help!

POEM SPEAKS

Reader, can you think like we outside of the dimensional world do?

Yesterday
I slept all day. The day before I stared at the wall. Friday I drank alone in the graveyard. Hower,
I am your testimony
wed with everything you imagine.
I lay round for specific reasons which could save the life of a secretary suffocating in a cubical on Wall Street. I might seem like a waste of space to you, then your mind is in its cage of skull right where it should be to suffer this century.
I come from a boundless place, so reader please recognize the limits of all well made opinions. I have the audacity to ask that you think through those bone bars. Come over to my side. I have no money food company job music drink or drugs. Here there is no TV car accidents noise rules deadlines lunch lines regulations politicians dry cleaners banks or boundaries. Only light, paper, symbols and the universe which is twisting in the center of my throat.

Riverside "Gay Day"

The first annual "Out in the Park" day was held on Sept. 27 at Riverside Amusement Park in Agawam.

Residents of the 2 in 20 Special Interest Program, as well as members of the GLBTA/Pride Alliance and Stonewall Center, visited the park.

One visitor to the park was overheard to say, "I've never seen so many gay people before!" And I had to agree. I've never seen so many Dragqueens and "out" people mixing with the general public before. The best part (O.K., other than the rides) was the total lack of homophobia we encountered. Yes, some people gawked and pointed; but they got over it!

To my knowledge, nobody was abused or accosted at all. There were also families with small children, and unless the parents mentioned it, none of the kids even seemed to notice.

Robert Davis

Being able to scream your head off while clutching your boyfriend for dear life on the "Cyclone" roller-coaster, and then not having to worry about snide comments was a bigger thrill than the ride itself!

The only disappointment of my day was finding both merry-go-rounds closed for the day. Watching the sun set from the top of the Ferris Wheel with the man I love was certainly the best part!

As for rides, I strongly recommend the "Mind-Eraser" roller-coaster; upside-down six times in 60 seconds with no fear of falling! What a rush!

Also, if you have $15 to spare and two willing friends, you can bungee-jump on the "Sky-Coaster."

Actually, there is no "coaster," only three people in a sling swinging from two bungee cords 120 feet off the ground!

I wasn't that brave. How about you?

Two in 20 day trip

By Robert Davis
Collegian Correspondent

On Sept. 20, 11 members of the Two in 20 Special Interest Residential Program visited Provincetown for the day.

P-town is well known as a gay, lesbian and bisexual resort during the summer months. Since many who went on the day trip had never visited P-Town before, going off-season eased them into the experience without the stress of traffic and crowds.

The group left at 8 a.m. and arrived just after noon. With a 30-minute stop for breakfast, there were about three-and-a- half hours road time.

The Two in 20 floor group spent most of the day browsing the shops along Commercial Street, a tourist hot spot. There were many guest houses displaying rainbow flags throughout the former Portuguese fishing town.

The pilgrim tower that dominates the view was the most interesting building, according to floor residents who enjoyed the day trip, though the view was somewhat obscured by the hazy weather.

The group paused for a brief moment to listen to the gay man's chorus, which was practicing in the town hall. A few members of the group stopped and sat on the beach to watch a man flying linked rainbow kites.

The overall consensus was that it was a fun and informative trip, according to Two in 20 residents, and the majority will probably return for another day's adventure.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Someone may insist that you hold your tongue today, but you will speak your piece, regardless. Be prepared for a fight.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You must beware of anything that seems too simple. You are likely to encounter unexpected complications when everything seems okay.

Loss OK in Chi.; medieval English style could work

The hype around Sunday night's Bears–Saints game is sort of like cutting classes to partake in the great American tradition of watching matinee baseball playoff games — but then rooting for the Yankees.

The hype placed on the game, or the playoffs, is certainly warranted, but the point of view's skewed worse than Rush Limbaugh's political views.

All everyone can talk about in this battle of a 1–4 (the 'aints) and an 0–5 ('da Bears) is how it's the Peyton Manning Bowl — the loser (change that, the team which scores fewer points) will have the inside track on drafting one of only 11 quarterbacks to lose to the Florida Gators in 1996. Don't knock Peyton for losing in The Swamp. He's damn good for one and this company's about as selective as the academic standards at _TK from Animal House.

Oh, by the way, some Ditka guy's making his return to Lake Shore Drive on Sunday. The man who Al Schwarsky's Super Fans said could win the Indy 500 driving a big bus or beat God in a round of golf, takes second fiddle this week to a college kid who's going to light Ole Miss up for about 5,000 passing yards on Saturday according to yesterday's Gospel of Luke.

This is wrong. David Letterman leaves NBC and he's a hero. Mike Ditka, the man who brought Chi–town its only Super Bowl win and one of the world's greatest parties to Rush Street, leaves NBC and he has to fight the White Sox and high school badminton for space on Page 15 of the Tribune Sports section.

Chicago's interests these days are better served by suiting up Al Bundy's Polk High squad and seeing if the balding behemoth with the stinky feet and deprived children can run for four touchdowns in a game once again.

A loss gives the Bears the inside track for the quarterback they have sorely needed for years of suffering through ones like Jim Harbaugh "ful" before his 1995 Captain Comeback Salad Days in Indy. The Bears have more incentive to just roll over and play dead for their old boss, keeping pace with the 0–5 Falcons for the Peyton Bowl. These two teams have little will to win, and actually are better off losing.

But, what if losing meant that instead of facing San Diego and Washington next year, the Bears have to go up against Saskatchewan and Winnipeg. Suppose if the Bears finished dead last, they would be punished by being shipped to the CFL next year. Think there might be a different attitude in Chicago — a team now looking at 1–4 New Orleans as the Second City's way out of the second division?

Come on, how many out there actually enjoyed watching the last months of the last Celtics season. This was some of the worst basketball played this side of Bali Bali, all in the honorable, and heavily media backed, quest for more blessed pingpong balls and with it — presumably — Tim Duncan.

If you saw In the Name of the Father you know how unjust the English system of government can be, but the EFA has one thing right. Relegation.

Here the lower classes suffer soccer's version of being tarred and feathered in the town square. Their dignity is torn asunder. It's a system that dates back to when the old stuff was new and beyond. In England, there is no reward for finishing last like in the States, only agony.

The association is set up in a hierarchical system of four divisions from the Carling FA Premiership to the lowly Third Division. Each year the three worst teams in each division move down, while the top three move up a division.

What if the Red Sox welcomed the Syracuse SkyChiefs, Toledo Mud Hens and Columbus Clippers to Fenway next year instead of Toronto, Detroit or the Yankees, while the PawSox travelled off to Dixieland for their big interleague series with the Atlanta Braves, not Richmond? Think Steve Avery might have made just more than one start in the final month of the season?

It could even work in college. UMass wants to go to Division I–A in football, and wouldn't it be great if the Big East banished Temple to promote the A–10 champ?

Ditka's back in Chicago this weekend. Maybe he'll go shopping on Michigan Avenue or grab a bite to eat in the original Pizzeria Uno's, in a basement on the corner of Ohio and Wabash just across the street from Pizzeria Due. But you know what, all the papparazzi couldn't care less... they'll be watching what happens in Oxford, Mississippi of all places Saturday.

Real Bear fans are wearing orange No. 16 jerseys these days and are booking flights to Orlando for the Citrus Bowl, which you can't spell without UT of course.

Ditka will be cheered when the Saints' coach comes to Chicago Sunday. Bear fans would love to see the Saints win this one, but for all the wrong reasons.

Women's lacrosse to host Tea time this weekend

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

The new and improved Richard F. Garber Field will be christened by the game that made it legendary this Saturday at 4 p.m., but don't look for the male persuasion on the new AstroTurf surface.

The Massachusetts women's lacrosse team (6–7 last season) will face the U.S. squad in the opener of the 1997 Teapot Tournament, with the exhibition tournament continuing on Sunday at the Lower Boyden Fields. Sixteen teams are planning the trip to UMass this weekend.

The Minutewomen are coming off their most successful season since reinstatement, and hosting a tournament of this caliber is a step toward national recognition. The field includes teams that are standard regional opponents for UMass like New Hampshire, Boston College and Harvard, but also national powers like Loyola University and club teams in the representative from Brine.

Admission to the U.S.–UMass game will be $2, with Sunday's games free to the viewing public.

UMass coach Francesca McClellan is ecstatic over the first fall exhibition tournament her team has had since the program's reinstatement in 1992. The size of the field of teams will bring in a level of competition unheard of in women's lacrosse at this University.

"We're so excited about this opportunity, and the strength of the teams, and the sheer number of teams, will lend a lot of credence to the tournament," McClellan said. "There's a great balance of teams, and a great balance in competition.

"There are a lot of teams we don't typically play, and vice versa."

One of those teams will be the Minutewomen's first opponent at 10 a.m. on Sunday, and one of the nation's best will face off with UMass on Field Three.

Last season's NCAA finalist, Loyola University, will take the field, and they will be just as tough an opponent as the U.S. squad. Maryland defeated Loyola in a hard–fought NCAA Championship final by a close 8–7 score at Lehigh University last May, and are a perennial top ten team. Along with their men's lacrosse team, who beat the Minutemen by an 11–8 score last spring here in Amherst, the team shows how lacrosse is a way of life in Baltimore, Md.

Other games for UMass on Sunday are two rematches from last season in Brown University at 11:20 a.m., and Hofstra University at 12:00 p.m., also held on Field Three.

On April 16th, the Minutewomen blitzed the Hofstra net in the first half, but were unable to solve goalkeeper Stephanie Clark, who made 20 saves in the match, losing 12–5. After a 1–1 tie to open the game, the Flying Dutchwomen ran off with eight of the next nine goals for the victory.

Sophomore Rebecca Minaker put a stamp on her stellar freshman campaign for UMass with four goals in the loss, a career–best mark.

In their last game of the season, UMass faced off with then–No. 11 Brown in Providence, R.I., looking to cap off their season over the .500 mark with an upset over the Bears. It was not to be, and Brown ran out to an 11–2 lead at the half for a final of 16–5.

Junior Laura Korutz ('97: 26 goals, 15 assists) became only the third Minutewoman in the past five years to eclipse the 40–point barrier with her two goals in the contest — joining then–fellow teammate Stephanie Walsh and Rachel Splaine for that honor.

Sunday's games for the Minutewomen will conclude with another new opponent in Colgate, which will be held on Field Two at 1:20 p.m.

"This is our first fall we've had here with real game opportunities," McClellan said. "Our objective is to begin and acclimate our freshmen for next spring, both studying and playing.

"We'll also get a chance for some quality playing time for our starters and our bench. So, this will be both an experience, and it'll be fun, and we can start to get our 9 freshmen on our team into the flow."

Patriots take Denver in AFC showdown

I've been thinking a whole lot about Monday night's match–up between the 5–0 Denver Broncos and the 4–0 New England Patriots.

I've been thinking about how much I would love to see the Pats destroy the Broncos.

I've been thinking about how scared I am that Denver will just give us the usual spanking they've done since I was an embryo.

Jonathan M. Place

I've been thinking about how much it hurt last year when after the 34–8 beating New England took, Shannon Sharpe, Denver's tight end, taunted the fans and basically acted as if playing the Pats was a joke.

I've been thinking how much I would of liked it if it was Ben Coates, New England's tight end, doing the fun making.

But now I've been thinking differently. I've been thinking about the AFC and how boring it has been for so many years. When was the last time that the AFC had more than one team that people were sure could go into the Super Bowl and win? I can't think of a year. Buffalo should of won it all in 1990, but Scott Norwood made sure that wasn't going to happen. And still, they were the only team that anyone thought might actually win.

So now we have two football teams, 9–0 combined. With wins over not so great teams, but that's only because no other team can match up against either team. Both teams have young premier running backs in Curtis Martin and Terrell Davis. Both have quarterbacks with cannons for arms in Drew Bledsoe and John Elway, who by the way have both been deemed QBs who will never win the big game.

So, why is this game so damned important?

This game is the AFC's only chance to prove to the football watching world that there are a couple of teams that will have a definite say in this year's Super Bowl.

I'll admit it. Last year, the Pats were too young and were lucky to be in there to begin with. Even though they were a great football team.

This year they are legitimate.

The Broncos are legitimate.

So even though I would love to see the Pats kick some Bronco tail, I just don't think it would be good for the AFC. Let's think about it. If one of the two titans crushes the other on Monday night, then there will only be one powerhouse left. If Denver destroys New England, every analyst in the country will say that the Patriots were never that great, and without Bill Parcells as head coach they're nothing.

If it's the other way around, I'm not sure the same things would be said, but Denver would be knocked down a level.

In order for these two teams to both get respect, this game must be a battle. A close, nail–biting, edge–of–your–seat thriller that goes down to the fourth quarter. With one of the quarterbacks as the hero. This is not a game for either Martin or Davis. It's a battle between the No. 1 draft pick in 1983 (Elway) and the No. 1 draft pick in 1993 (Bledsoe). It's a time for one of them to prove to the world that they can win the big game.

Just by reading the newspapers, anyone can see that the football world is tired of NFC dominance. It makes for boring football when only one half of the league wins for 13 years in a row. How much do we really need to see Dallas and San Francisco win again? And don't even get me started on Green Bay, because the way they are playing right now I'm starting to think they are one hit wonders.

It is imperative that the NFL proves that they have great teams in both conferences.

The Broncos are favored by four and a half points over the Patriots. My heart says Patriots, but my brain is screaming Broncos.

Oh well, if I ever listened to my brain I might have a 4.0 GPA and not be down here writing all day.

I'll take New England in the best football game of the season. Patriots 31, Denver 20.

In other NFL news:

Quickly reviewing the rest of this weekend a few games have jumped out at me.

Obviously the Battle of the Bays has caught everybody's attention. Tampa Bay (5–0) will attempt to punish Green Bay (3–2) like they have five other teams. At

Regrets stay as the Boston Garden falls

I never visited Boston Garden.

I never got to feel the magic of the place. I never sat in the broken yellow seats or had my view blocked by one of the omnipresent poles. I never saw the rats. I never witnessed Larry Bird shooting an off–balance shot, nor did I see Cam Neely deliver a crushing body check there.

I never saw a concert, wrestling or even "Sesame Street Live there."

I never visited the Boston Garden and now, sadly, I never will.

There was a long time before I decided on sportswriting for a career. Over that time, I saw my fair share of sporting events, and as an athlete myself, I always had a personal interest in the games.

But either because I was younger, or because it really didn't matter at the time, I paid no attention to what it meant to be in a historic stadium or arena (not that some of the places I've been are all that historic — the Kingdome?).

There is a certain mystique to old barns. Even if stadiums have been reconditioned or remodeled, a number of them keep a certain air about them. And visiting them, witnessing and experiencing the palpable aura of the legends who called those buildings home, is an incredible feeling.

Casey Kane

It is similar, in a way, to travelling to a national historic monument. The same amazement some people experience visiting the Lincoln Memorial (or any historic edifice in Washington, D.C.) can compare to the feeling some sports fans get at Fenway Park, Soldier Field or Madison Square Garden. The same holds true for Green Bay's Lambeau Field and Chicago's Wrigley.

Just the mere presence of these stadiums, arenas and parks speaks volumes about the history they have seen. MSG has been the home to basketball's NIT for ages. Clair Bee's Long Island University teams played there. Aldoph Rupp's Kentucky teams reigned there in an era when the NIT was king. Madison Square Garden has also hosted thousands of professional basketball games. The pro's best have pounded the hardwood in New York.

Unfortunately, historical athletic venues are quickly becoming a thing of the past. Corporate sponsorships and multi–million dollar deals have given business giants their biggest billboards ever. The space–age, fully–stocked, push–a–button–and–everything–is–at–your–fingertips, Starbucks and schezuan next to the program guy, technological wonders — new stadiums.

What better way to promote the Ericsson cellular phone than Charlotte's Ericsson Stadium? What about Houlihan Stadium? Cynergy Field? Boston's own FleetCenter?

If it matters, 3Com will always be Candlestick to me.

At least these stadiums have seen name changes. Others have died completely. The home of Hank Aaron's record 715th home run is no longer. Now, the Braves call Turner Field their home.

Canada denies assassination charge

UNITED NATIONS (AP) — Canada angrily denied involvement in an apparent assassination attempt by two suspected Israeli spies and said yesterday it was recalling its ambassador to Israel to protest the use of forged Canadian passports in the affair.

Foreign Minister Lloyd Axworthy said Canada had determined the passports were forged and that neither of the men were Canadian nationals. They were arrested last week in Amman, Jordan, after an apparent attempt on the life of a top official of the militant Palestinian group Hamas.

"There is no record whatsoever of any Canadian complicity in this matter," Axworthy said. "Canada had nothing to do with it."

Axworthy, who was in New York to attend the U.N. General Assembly debate, spoke to Israel's deputy foreign minister to relay word of the Canadian protest. He was to meet later with the Jordanian foreign minister.

Axworthy said that when Israeli agents use forged Canadian passports, it puts Canadian travelers at risk in the Middle East. He said Canada takes "great exception to the use of the reputation of Canadian passports for those kinds of purposes."

Navy Tomcat fighter crashes off Va. coast

VIRGINIA BEACH, Va. (AP) — A Navy F-14 Tomcat fighter jet on a routine training flight crashed yesterday in the Atlantic Ocean off the east Coast. The Navy said one crew member was rescued and a search was under way for another.

It was the seventh military plane crash since Sept. 13. The six earlier crashes happened within a week and led to a one-day break in training flights for a safety review by all the services.

The Navy jet went down about 4 p.m. about 65 miles east of Elizabeth City, N.C., said Coast Guard Petty Officer Harry Craft. Craft said a Coast Guard helicopter rescued the plane's radar intercept officer.

"We have recovered the backseater and he supposedly was in good shape, and we're still on scene now looking for the pilot," Craft said.

The plane was training with another aircraft when it went down, said Mike Maus, a Navy spokesman.

Both crew members ejected from the plane, Maus said.

The fighter was assigned to the Oceana Naval Air Station at Virginia Beach. The Navy said three of its ships were within 40 miles of the crash site and, along with aircraft from the Navy and Coast Guard, were participating in the search.

Pres. Wong impeachment rumors addressed at SGA exec. meeting

THANG VO/ COLLEGIAN

Lia Wong and Peter Kilbourne address rumors of Wong's impeachment during last night's SGA meeting.

By Victoria Groves
Collegian Staff

A meeting of the University of Massachusetts Student Government Association (SGA) executive cabinet and other officials was interrupted last night when approximately 200 ALANA (Asian, Latino, African, Native American) students sat in to discuss rumors of impeaching SGA President Lia Wong.

Members of Wong's executive cabinet were present, along with Speaker of the Senate Peter Kilbourne, Associate Speaker Lisa Cook, Trustee Brian Tirrell, Elections Chancellor Jodi Bailey, Representative to the Board of Higher Education Elly Court, and Jason Vecchio, Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA) student coordinator.

The meeting was conducted as usual while onlookers sat on the floor and at nearby desks. Malwin Davila, chairperson for the ALANA caucus, interrupted and addressed the group.

"The reason we are here is that rumors are going around that there is a group trying to impeach Lia Wong. We want to either confirm the rumor or lay it to rest right now," Davila said.

Kilbourne gave his full support to Wong as did all other officials and cabinet members present at the meeting.

"There are rumors... at this point I do not support impeachment. I will actively go against any group that wants to impeach her," Kilbourne said.

"Lia Wong is our president, she will remain our president. She is not going anywhere," Bailey said.

Onlookers pressured Kilbourne and Wong to air their differences in front of the audience, but both of them declined.

"We are setting up a mediation. This is not the proper time or place to get into an argument," Kilbourne said. "I don't want to slander the SGA president in a room full of 200 people!"

Wong promised the group that the personal and professional problems between herself and Kilbourne would not affect the workings of the senate.

"We will work as a group and work on issues to address your concerns. Our problems will not stop us from advocating on your behalf," Wong said.

Some of the rumors to impeach Wong stemmed from a letter she sent to John Bracey, secretary of the Faculty Senate, dated Sept. 26. In the letter, Wong made demands regarding issues such as the honors college, tuition and fees, among others.

New University Center plans debated at meeting

By Julie Siegal
Collegian Staff

Ideas were thrown on the table last night at the first meeting for the University Center 2000 Committee (UC 2000), a group consisting of students and faculty who are planning the building of a new University Center.

The meeting, led by members of the Student Center for Educational Research and Advocacy (SCERA), focused on plans for various student services to be built inside the new University Center.

Highlighted at the meeting was the concept of having computer commons, or large, open rooms with comfortable seating where students can go to surf the net, write papers and possibly lounge around with coffee and muffins.

Slides of computer commons from other large universities around the country were shown, as a basis for proposing ideas among the committee members.

As part of the computer commons, laptop wiring throughout the University Center was suggested, but the idea was immediately combatted by both students and faculty.

"I see such few students at UMass with laptops," said Marc Kenen, SCERA director. "Do we just need a place where we can plug in or do we need to supply the lap-

CAMBRIDGE — For the second day in a row, Edward O'Brien lashed out publicly at Middlesex District Attorney Thomas Reilly, the man he blamed for sending his son to prison for life. Talking with reporters on his front lawn yesterday, the elder O'Brien said he was convinced his son Eddie had been framed for the first-degree murder of neighbor Janet Downing, found stabbed 98 times in her dining room.

"Our son hasn't had a chance from day one," O'Brien said outside his Somerville home. He said Reilly pursued the case against his son without considering other possibilities because he wanted to further his political career.

"We hope that someone out there in this system has the intestinal fortitude to go against Mr. Reilly and do what's right," O'Brien said, placing his hopes in the appeals process. Observers agreed the nationally-televised trial

Media banned from trial of alleged American terrorist

By Anita Snow
Associated Press

HAVANA — Reporters are barred from the trial of an American who faces the death penalty if convicted of crimes against state security, the Cuban government said yesterday, one day before the trial begins.

"This will be a closed-door proceeding," Foreign Ministry spokesman Alejandro Gonzalez said of the trial of Walter Van der Veer.

It was not immediately clear why the government decided to close Friday's trial to both the foreign and the government-controlled national media. Virtually all court proceedings in Cuba are open, and early indications had been that reporters would have access. The case has attracted much attention in the United States, especially in the Miami area, where Van der Veer once lived and which is home to most Cuban exiles.

Van der Veer, 52, was arrested in August 1996 and charged with gathering materials for Molotov cocktails and plotting attacks against police and tourists.

The trial comes during a difficult time in U.S.-Cuba relations, punctuated by a string of hotel bombings that the Cuban government has blamed on U.S.-based exile groups.

Cuban authorities earlier this month arrested a Salvadoran who reportedly confessed to the bombings, including one that killed an Italian businessman.

In the Van der Veer case, the Cuban government has grown defensive after U.S. officials expressed doubts about the reliability of Cuba's legal system. Cuban prosecutors said earlier this month that they would seek the death penalty against Van der Veer, but government officials here say privately that they don't believe the American will be sentenced to death.

U.S. officials say they do not know of any U.S. citizen who was ever put to death in a Cuban legal proceeding.

Cuba's official Granma newspaper said the United States has no "moral authority" to criticize the trial. Van der Veer has been given all legal guarantees and has received several visits from officials of the U.S. Interest Section in Havana," Granma reported.

"This is simple insolence, because... actions here have shown an absolute respect for legal procedure, and secondly because the United States does not have an ounce of moral authority to address this subject," the article said.

The United States "should eliminate the defects in its own (legal) system, including its complicity over the last 38 years with terrorists of Cuba extraction," it added.

That appeared to be a reference to several cases in which Cubans accused of hijacking or other crimes involved in attempts to flee the island were acquitted in U.S. courts.

The U.S. State Department learned in August of Cuba's intent to seek the death penalty, but only confirmed the decision in September.

In a letter to his lawyer, Van der Veer said he is prepared to die and will ask to be executed when he stands trial.

"I am no coward and I have asked this government 159 times to please shoot me so that I can die with honor, not waste away at 100 pounds or less," Van der Veer wrote his attorney, Ellis Rubin, earlier this month.

Rubin has acknowledged that the Miami man has links to Comandos L, a Miami-based group that seeks to infiltrate Cuban society and, using violence and other means, incite the people to overthrow the communist regime of Fidel Castro.

Rubin says Van der Veer was working as a missionary in Cuba, associated with the Church of the Little Flower in Coral Gables, Fla.

The church, however, says Van der Veer was only a volunteer usher.

Coalition pleads case for ALANA grad recruitment, health-care

By India Joy Rose
Collegian Correspondent

A coalition of women activists including University of Massachusetts graduate and undergraduate students, Women's Studies faculty and staff, Graduate Employee Organization (GEO) members and the Director of the Everywoman's Center gathered in Bartlett Hall yesterday to march to Chancellor David K. Scott's office to present signatures on petition supporting GEO's contract demands.

The signatures, which included Northampton Mayor Mary Ford, were collected over the weekend at the Women's Activists Alumni Conference.

GEO proposed to the Chancellor a contract that addressed issues regarding funding for the Office of Asian, Latino, African, and Native American (ALANA) Graduate Student Recruitment, health care, higher wages, and child care.

The main emphasis in the discussion between the organization and Scott was child care. Anne Ferguson, Director of the Women's Studies Department, lead the march to Whitmore. The women wore buttons and pinned signs that read "Child Care Now!"

The women marched through Whitmore singing for the need for child care. As they made their presence felt on the second floor of Whitmore, the office doors slammed as they proceeded down the hall. The organization presented a petition signed by 118 people in support of the contract, and discussed the child care issue.

"We're interested in child care, it's an important issue and we'll take it right to the bargaining table," Scott said, when asked what steps he was going to take on the issue.

When presented the statistics involved with child care, Scott said, "I am not aware of the numbers involved".

CVSA to hold dream date auction at Bluewall Cafe

The "Dream Date Social," which is being sponsored by Cape Verdean Student Alliance (CVSA), will be held tomorrow at 8 p.m. at the Bluewall Cafe, located inside the University of Massachusetts Campus Center.

The highlight of the evening will feature an auction of various students from the Asian, Latino, African and Native American (ALANA) community. Members of the audience will be able to buy a dream date with the person of their choice. Only cash will be accepted for payment.

The auction will end at approximately 10 p.m. An after party, featuring Cape Verdean music, is scheduled from 10 p.m. – 1 a.m. at the Bluewall. Anyone who enjoys dancing to Cape Verdean music, or would like to learn, is encouraged to stay for the after party.

CVSA is reaching out and inviting UMass and Five College students, especially from the ALANA community, to attend and participate.

The names of people being auction off are not being disclosed to the general public at this time, but we do know that most members of the ALANA community will be represented. Participants will be featured on center stage with their own personal song, during which they will try to convince the audience that they are worth the money.

Bidding will open at a certain amount and will operate similar to any other auction.

All proceeds will benefit the CVSA "Funds for Future Programs." For further information, please contact the President of CVSA, Paulo Barros at 546–1558, or Secretary of Public Relations, Marlene Gomes at 546–3720.

"I did request a deadline of six weeks during yesterday's senate meeting, but I had intended that the answers to these questions be given within two weeks," Wong wrote.

In a memo addressed to Wong and dated Sept. 30, Bracey reacted to the demands made and the way they were presented.

"The Faculty Senate is not in the habit of accepting rude, disrespectful and incoherent demands from anyone. We find it particularly distasteful that the SGA leadership feels it has the right to set deadlines for Faculty Senate business," Bracey wrote.

Copies of both letters were passed out at the meeting.

Former ALANA caucus member Megan Demuriano spoke to the group after all SGA members assured the visitors that there would be no impeachment coming out of the SGA office, clarifying the reason that they were at the meeting.

"We're here because we are concerned... we have just been guaranteed that they will not impeach her. We're here and we're not going away," Demuriano said.

In order to impeach the SGA president, a two-thirds vote is needed in the Senate. Currently, there is no elected Senate.

After the meeting, Kilbourne stated that he looked forward to clearing up these internal conflicts and was glad to know that students support their student leaders.

"I'm proud that Lia and I are able to work on these issues privately because they do not concern the whole student body... it's nice to know students show up to support their leaders in a time of crisis," Kilbourne said.

Earlier yesterday, Wong fired Tom Sadlowski, student Attorney General from her cabinet, and announced at the meeting last night that she was accepting applications for the position, but would not give details as to why Sadlowski was fired.

"I will not disclose details at this time... I fired him on insubordination," Wong said.

Sadlowski could offer no reasons for his termination, but feels he will still be able to continue with his work even without the title of Attorney General.

"I don't know why I was fired. But I don't need to be student Attorney General to keep doing what I'm doing," Sadlowski said.

The students present at the meeting were encouraged to run for student government, and nomination forms for the senate as well as the ALANA caucus were passed out at the end of the meeting.

Nominations for senate close on October 15 and the election will be held on October 22. Additional nomination forms may be picked up at the SGA office.

tops, also?"

Most students own desktops, rather than laptops, said student Chris Bell, member of the Game Hobbyists League.

"It's not feasible to expect students to have both a desktop and laptop," he said. "Someone like me would need PCs down there [computer commons]."

The main concern about installing computer commons on campus, though, asked the question of what UMass students really need.

The new commons must support students' technological needs for the future, said student Robert Fleming who represents four different registered student organizations (RSOs).

"We can use laptops now, but what are our needs for the next 20–30 years," Fleming said. "We might have an outdated facility in five years, never mind 20."

A cyber cafe was also suggested as a place for students to go where they can surf the net, e-mail their friends, write term papers, all with coffee and bagel in hand.

This idea was also tossed aside by committee members.

"A regular cyber cafe is small with only about 10 computers," Fleming said. "If computers are put in the Bluewall, there'd be at least 20–30 computers, too many to maintain."

In other business, a discussion was led on counselling and advising services and which ones need to be centralized and brought into the campus center.

The members agreed the counselling and advising centers on campus are too unevenly distributed, which inconveniences students.

"Counselling and Advising needs to be centralized," said Sarah Madison, transfer credit evaluator for undergraduates. "Whether or not it should be in the campus center is another question.

The notion of creating a satellite office for University Health Services (UHS) was also suggested.

Committee members recommended the satellite office treat patients for sore throats, injuries and other minor symptoms that do not need to be treated by the main UHS office.

The final issue of conference and meeting space for RSOs leaned in the direction of building a theater designed for production with comfortable seating, assembly space for large meetings and smaller furnished lounges for more informal meetings.

The UC 2000 Committee's goal is to have the new University Center plan fully developed by the end of the 1997–98 academic year.

Their next meeting, which will focus on Cultural Centers, will take place from 5–7 p.m. on Thurs., Oct. 16 in Campus Center 803.

Benefit for NoHo shelter Sat.

Robert Fisher Productions and Promotions to host concert

By Laura Barcella
Collegian Staff

On Saturday, Oct. 4, Robert Fisher Productions and Promotions will be holding the third annual benefit concert for Necessities/Necesidades, a women's shelter in Northampton.

Entitled "A Celebration of Women's Voices," the concert will feature six folk artists: Annie Wenz, Justina and Joyce, Lindsay Armore (an 11–year–old singer/songwriter), Brenda Evans, and the rock/folk band Free at Last, plus blues artists Susan Gulielmetti and Peter Kim.

In addition to performing, Susan Gulielmetti is working with Robert Fisher to promote and organize the concert. She said that she "hopes for [a turnout of] 100 people," although the church has the capacity to hold about 600 people.

To promote the event, Gulielmetti and Fisher distributed fliers and have had the concert announced on various local radio stations.

Necessities/Necesidades is a shelter which has been central to the Hampshire County women's community for 20 years. Though it will serve women from anywhere, the Northampton organization primarily assists local women and their children.

The shelter provides a vast array of services. Roz Cuomo, the head of the shelter, listed the services offered

"We have an emergency shelter, a 24–hour hotline, counseling, court–based legal advocates, and support groups for abused mothers and lesbians," Cuomo said.

"Last year, over 1,000 women came for court advocacy and counseling," Cuomo said.

The third annual Celebration of Women's Voices Benefit Concert will be held at The First Church on Main and Center Streets in Northampton (across from The Iron Horse Music Hall). The concert will begin at 7 and last until about 9:30 p.m. Tickets are $5 for six musical groups, and they may be purchased at the door.

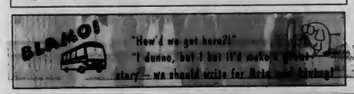
had political implications for Reilly, who chose to prosecute the case himself. Had he lost, Reilly, considered a future candidate for state attorney general, would have been open to charges of political opportunism or incompetence.

In a press conference after the verdict, the district attorney said he could understand the frustration of the O'Brien family, who lost their only son to prison for the rest of his life. But Reilly said he was simply doing his job.

"This has nothing to do with politics," he said.



Reilly said that his decision to prosecute the case was more personal than political. He said Eddie O'Brien, who was 15 at the time of the killing, was uncommonly violent and would kill again.

"I made a personal commitment to myself the night that he was arrested that I would finish this job. I would get this case to the Superior Court and that he would answer for what he had done," he said. "I would get justice for this family."

Dan Payne, a Democratic media consultant, said Reilly probably had more to lose than gain by choosing to prosecute the case himself. A loss might have encouraged a Republican candidate to seek his position, using a botched murder case as the basis of a campaign, he said.

At the same time, Payne said Wednesday's conviction will not likely be a political boon for Reilly, in part because it would be unseemly to capitalize on the tragedy of two Somerville families.

"By the time he has to face the voters, my guess is this case will have been forgotten and it will be up to the Reilly campaign to decide whether it's politically useful to him," he said. "My guess is it is not."

With a university of 24,000 students and 6,000 workers, there are only 78 slots available in the child care facility. Only 19 are subsidized for low income students. These figures have remained constant for more than the past twenty years.

"Student activities did not tell me child care was a priority," said Scott.

Scott was reluctant to answer any questions that pertained to the issues being discussed at the bargaining table. "Under the law I am not allowed to discuss anything that has to do with bargaining," Scott said. "You will see investments in child care, just not today."

Allegations raised in Soweto murder

By Tom Cohen
Associated Press

JOHANNESBURG, South Africa — Winnie Madikizela-Mandela raised new allegations yesterday on the kidnapping, beatings and murder that have haunted her for more than eight years.

At an unorthodox news conference where no questions were permitted, the former wife of President Nelson Mandela said a former ally turned enemy was behind the beatings of four young men in 1988, one of whom later was found dead.

Ms. Madikizela-Mandela, flanked by two lawyers and five alleged witnesses who refused to answer questions, read a statement to journalists that admitted 14-year-old Stompie Seipei was beaten with three others at her Soweto home in December 1988. The statement left many questions unanswered.

Members of the Mandela United football club, her bodyguards at the time, beat Seipei and the others because they were told the four allowed themselves to be sexually abused at a Methodist church home, she said.

Xoliswa Falati, a former supporter of Ms. Madikizela-Mandela, brought the four to Ms. Madikizela-Mandela's home and told the bodyguards about the sexual abuse, Ms. Madikizela-Mandela said. Seipei was found dead days later, and one of Ms. Madikizela-Mandela's bodyguards was convicted of murdering him and is serving a life prison sentence.

Ms. Madikizela-Mandela was convicted in 1991 of kidnapping the four young men and being an accessory to their assault. At her trial, she said the four left the church home with her bodyguards to escape sexual abuse.

Falati testified at the trial that Ms. Madikizela-Mandela was away from Soweto at the time, but later said she lied during the trial to protect Ms. Madikizela-Mandela.

Ms. Madikizela-Mandela spent more than three hours last week answering questions by investigators from South Africa's Truth and Reconciliation Commission at a closed hearing. A public hearing on allegations against her has been scheduled for Nov. 24.

Let's talk about sex!

Alexis Pushkar

I would hazard a guess that sex is on the minds of most UMass students. Notes for an organic chemistry class might read something like this: "The formula for tert–butanol is sex and when it reacts with sex it produces..."

But just because we think about it doesn't mean we really know that much about it. Believe it or not, there is a place for sex education in college, and Dr. Abel is the place to go on campus. His views on sex education are applicable not only to UMass, but to sex education in general in this country.

One of the joys of hitting puberty is that schools start scrambling to educate students about the evils of promiscuity. Unlike Europeans, Americans tend to be prudish about sex, perhaps due to our Puritan heritage. The Puritans forbade dancing, among other things, and I would bet my life savings that their schools didn't educate their children about sex. Though sex is plastered all over our media, parents and teachers aren't always crazy about discussing it with students. When they do, they often try to keep it "tasteful" by using scientific terminology. But adults who try to sidestep thorny issues or use sterile scientific terms or send conflicting messages like: "abstain and use a condom" are doing more harm than good, however noble their intentions are.

Recently I heard Dr. Jim Abel give a candid talk about sex to UMass honors students. A doctor at University Health Services, Dr. Abel is that rare adult who will tell it like it is, in graphic detail without blushing and without shame.

In my opinion, we need more of this where sex is concerned. Most adults' views on sex were shaped in a more religious era than the present, and the major religions tend to have fairly idealistic views of the way sex should be in society.

For example, I am sure that fundamentalist Christian organizations would not approve of Dr. Abels's list of topics from his recent talk. They included such issues as female masturbation, bisexuality and foreplay. He tossed out goody bags of condoms for correct answers to his questions, and offered advice on ways guys could use condoms to masturbate. But the bottom line is that he was direct and honest, would answer any question, and offered raunchy advice on alternatives to sex and explained the bewildering world of contraceptives in funny terms.

In the January/February 1997 edition of the NH Christian Coalition Newsletter, Betty Breuder is featured as a heroine for her help in dismissing a seventh–grade education teacher, Wayne Goldner, because he had a "questionable commitment to abstinence education in past years," and he used "explicit materials." There is a difference between what is appropriate for seventh–graders and what is appropriate for older kids, say high school or college. But Breuder and her supporters advocate teaching about sex in a traditional manner rather than exposing kids to information which may ultimately help them make better decisions.

It is my belief that the only way kids can understand is to be told in terms that they can understand, which may mean slang and may mean the advocation of taboo topics like masturbation. Dr. Abel has a point when he says that, "sex education in this country sucks."

The only thing I heard after I was told that I would be "going through some changes" was that if I couldn't control myself and abstain, I should use a condom. Which condom? Which brand? What if he says he doesn't wear them? What are they made of? How do they work? What is lubrication? Where can I get them?

I was never presented with the knowledge to ask what a spermicide was. I was never told how to use a condom. I had no idea what a diaphragm was. If kids are not given the basic knowledge in order to ask questions, how will they ever learn. Nobody would intuitively know about the French Revolution if somebody had not told them.

I am not sure that 10–year–olds should be taught about "finger–fking," which is something that Dr. Abel mentions, but it is doubtful that many do not know about it.

What is appropriate for middle school kids and early high school kids differs significantly from what can and should be discussed with late high school and college students. I think that as students move through high school and college, the information can be a lot more explicit. Issues that are more complex such as homosexuality, and issues that are more graphic like foreplay can be discussed with older kids. However, openness is the key.

The street language of sex is graphic, but it is what kids hear. Dr. Abel's bags of condoms bear stickers saying, "Friends don't let friends fk drunk." Kids understand. They think it's funny, and maybe they remember as well.

I wish that more people on this campus could hear him speak, and I don't think that his material is too far off base for older high school students. Adults may cringe when he says, "Your vagina, your fingers, go for it." But his information is correct and clear and he understands how to reach kids. When the consequences of ignorance could destroy a life through disease or create a life at the wrong time, education is of the utmost importance. Sometimes ideology should take a back seat to practicality.

Alexis Pushkar is a UMass student.

Don't get hurt here

Daniel Levenson

Getting hurt in America can be an expensive thing. Fall off your roof, crash your car, get attacked by a rabid opossum and not only are you looking at the financial burden of having to pay for medical attention — you're likely to pay an emotional toll as well.

The business of medicine doesn't seem to care about how your injury (and treatment) will affect your quality of life, only how quickly you will either recover or die and thereby cease to cost them money.

Which is not to say that there still aren't physicians and nurses who care. But the fact is that they are under increasing pressure to operate within a system whose principle drive is the lowly dollar.

Health insurance companies have elevated themselves to a dangerous position in the medical world, where they can, by virtue of controlling the cash flow, alter the course of treatment for an individual, and in some cases affect whether that person lives or dies.

They do this by telling patients and physicians that they will or will not pay for what are, in some cases, life–saving therapies.

A central issue in the health care debate is patient autonomy, or the right of the patient to control their own care and assert their opinions and ideas on their condition and treatment.

Traditionally there has been a power struggle between patients and physicians. For example, should doctors be able to force a person to undergo treatment that they may not want to have, even if it is to save their life?

Now there is a third party in the picture — mega corporations who only have a financial interest in the patient–doctor relationship.

The majority doesn't give a rat's ass if little Suzy can walk again. They only care about the cost of a wheelchair versus the cost of surgery.

Whichever is cheaper wins. Many businesses weigh the long term consequences of an action against possible short–term gain, but in an enterprise where human lives are at stake, it looks like short–term gains outweigh long term benefits.

Not only does a patient's right to therapy get sidelined by the insurance companies, they also alienate health care providers from recipients. It's not a health insurance executive standing in a hospital room telling someone they can't have anymore tests run on them, it's a doctor. The patient views the situation as not only the insurance company denying them help, but also the doctors themselves telling them that they won't help them.

Perhaps one of the biggest problems here is the way that health care providing corporations are run. An insurance company is fine for house fires or stolen cars. These things happen relatively infrequently when compared to the number of people who use health insurance.

Think about it this way: compare the number of times you've gotten sick in the past five years compared to the number of times you're car has been stolen or your home destroyed by a fire.

Insurance companies are designed in such a way that they make their money from customers rarely having to file claims. With a growing population and more and more Americans needing health care, it make absolutely no sense to have a mostly private healthcare system that relies on people never needing treatment. Maybe in a perfect world we would all live to 120, never break bones, get into accidents, or need immunizations, but we don't. And it's time the insurance companies realized that.

I don't know if more or less government intervention is needed. Ideally, perhaps, we should somehow devise a system that combines the public and private sector in a way that allows physicians to provide quality health care, and insures patient's rights.

Ultimately the power over how people are treated should be removed from the corporate world and returned to the arena of medicine, where it belongs.

Letters to the Editor

SGA ballot too wordy

To the editor:

In last Wednesday's paper, the article about the SGA referendum questions and Lia Wong's letter to the editor demonstrated, yet again, the poor leadership qualities of our SGA president. Questions 3 through 6, submitted by Tom Sadlowski and Lia Wong, addressed issues of little or no concern to the general student body. The wording of the SGA constitution is a technicality, not a pertinent issue on campus. Students are far more concerned with the food in the dining commons, the availability of classes and the future of the Student Union, than whether Article VII, section 5 says "days" or "calendar days." The wording of the questions was too complex and filled with legal jargon. Are Massachusetts residents asked about the language of the state constitution during the November elections? No, there are more important issues to collect opinions on. If the SGA is obligated to bring these details to referendum, then they should amend their by–laws. What message does this convey to the students when these semantics are the major issues in SGA? Less than 1 percent of all commuter students and less than 5 percent of on–campus students voted in Wednesday's election. Wong and Sadlowski are damaging the image of the SGA by wasting the opportunity to hear student opinions on real issues.

The letter to the editor displayed Wong's lack of connection with the diverse interests of the students. The letter was an impulsive statement not considering all sides of the issue. It was not a collective voice of the students. A student leader does not jump on the current political band– wagon. There are major repercussions to boycotting an important organization such as the Red Cross. A good student leader should evaluate these before making a public statement.

How long will the student body put up with an unrepresentative and unqualified SGA president?

Arik Colbath

Mill Valley "Last Call" immature.

To the editor:

In the newspaper's attempt to be unbiased in its view, I feel that the column "Last Call" by Luke Meredith is out of place and immature in the light of alleged alcohol–related death on campus. My main objection is its immaturity in that the author calls "good friends of Amherst" bars where underage drinkers can "fubar" themselves aside the law at ease. This camaraderie with a bar that doesn't care about the age of its patrons is an illusion to fact that because alcohol is being consumed on the premises, the establishment is responsible for its patrons. Even if this column has been written in satire, the nature of an argument of "Yea, I get drunk, yea, I'm underage, and, yea, I don't care," should all stop to think about its feasibility.

Proud to be feminist

To the editor:

In response to Laura Barcella's brave article on Feminism in Thursday's "Women's Issues" section of the Collegian, I would have to agree with every statement she has asserted. It disgusts me that practically since the beginning of time, women have been basically subservient to the male sex, oppressed in every issue and in any way possible. Throughout the existence of human kind, women have achieved as much as men, but rarely have their efforts and successes been recorded by a male dominated society. There is no logical reason for the belief that one sex is greater or better than the other. Barcella's examples of society's expectations for women, including the sickly but strictly enforced belief that women should "look 16 until she's in her grave," demonstrate that it is time for society to open its eyes and drop these unfair expectations. And concerning sexual activity, why aren't the same names (i.e. "slut" and "prude") imposed on the male gender as they are unfairly on the female gender? Why is it that a male who has slept with numerous women is considered a hero, yet a woman of the same nature is shunned and looked down upon; treated like an unfeeling beast who's only concern is pleasure?

It is a sad thing that, as expertly stated by Barcella, women have a fear of claiming the title of being a "feminist." After all, what woman wants to be associated with the militant, masculine stereotype eloquently described by Barcella? To avoid being chided and attacked, many women voluntarily slip into the mindless, Barbie–doll state demanded by society. It is an outrage that feminist activists are constantly cut down for their so–called "radical" ideas. Feminism is the promotion of equal rights for women. And what is more civil and advanced than equal rights for all? Those who fervently obey the feudal, medieval system of male dominance should grow up, wake up, and enter the 20th century. It is time for a change, time for equality and time for action.

Thanks from campus skinheads

To the editor:

This letter is in regards to the article on "Anti-Semitism Today: from the Tuesday, Sept. 30 issue of the Collegian. I would like to thank Lauren Levin for mentioning in her lecture series that not all skinheads practice anti-Semitism or racism, and that some skinheads adopt the values of the English working class. In fact, the majority of the skinheads in the United States today are not racist, and do not hate, etc.

As some people (but not enough) know, skinheads got their origin in the '60s when Jamaican workers came to England. It was not until the early '80s that skinhead became associated with white power organizations. This was due to the growing popularity of the NF (British National Front.) The NF would recruit people at concerts that skinheads would frequently attend, and since have slagged the subculture down by creating a horrid stereotype. The Nazi skinheads of today hide out, and try to show their faces as little as possible. The only time they usually come out is around April 19 (Hitler's birthday), and this year their annual concert was cancelled due to the enormous protesting that was done in Buffalo (the site of the concert) by the organization ARA (Anti-Racist Action). This group along with the ADL, works to monitor the amount of Nazi skinhead activity across the country.

I would just like to thank, on behalf of all the UMass skinheads, the columnist and Lauren Levin again, for helping to straighten out something long over due. If anyone else is interested a web page with more information is available at http://www.vt.edu:10021/l/jadare/skinhead/

New look Samples delight at Pearl Street

COURTESY WHAT ARE RECORDS?

Longtime Samples Sean Kelly (left) and Andy Sheldon (right) welcomed two new members to the band recently. The new line–up hit Pearl Street on Wednesday night.

THE SAMPLES
Pearl Street
Oct. 1

Despite band troubles early this year which resulted in the departing of two founding members, The Samples are still out there touring, and playing their atmospheric brand of rock–and–roll as hard, sweet and as sincere as ever. The show they put on at Pearl Street in Northampton on Wednesday night proved that this is one of America's most hard–working, fan–loving and under–appreciated bands.

The band chose an interesting way to introduce themselves to the audience via a short film shown at the beginning. Then, in the flesh, they opened with the straight–up rocker — in that elevated Samples fashion, of course — "On The Losing End Of Distance" (from guitarist/singer Sean Kelly's solo album Light House Rocket). The band had everyone swaying and singing along to the band's soul and world– weary lyrics of each of their songs.

The Samples founders Kelly and bassist/singer Andy Sheldon seemed to really enjoy the new company they had on stage in drummer Kenny James, keyboardist Alex Matson and acoustic guitarist Rob Somers. In late spring/early summer ex–drummer Jeep MacNichol and ex–keyboardist Al Laughlin had parted on good terms to pursue their own different musical interests.

The band's extensive set included a couple of new songs, such as "Prehistoric Bird" and "Flying," the latter of which can be found on their new live/studio 2–disc set Transmissions From The Sea Of Tranquility, which also has the first recordings of the new lineup. However, they also broke out with the crowd favorites "Did You Ever Look So Nice?" and "Feel Us Shaking," which almost all of the crowd sang along with one of the Samples most classic verses: "Beneath the sea, another world exists / It's tugging me by the ankles and my wrists / The morning wind come and pull me away / Out to where the dolphins play."

Other highlights of the show, besides the ongoing film footage of western U.S. deserts and canyons, dolphins (for "Feel Us Shaking") and random cultural images, were Andy Sheldon's acoustic guitar and vocals on "Prophet Of Doom," from their inimitable 1993 album, The Last Drag; Kenny James' romping drum solo; and the encore songs "My Town" (which, like "Feel Us Shaking," is from the original band's 1989 self–titled debut), and an acoustic version of "Summertime," from 1992's No Room.

Samples fans last night got a great introduction to their reunited band, now with a slightly more aggressive drummer, but otherwise no different. Alex Matson helped support the band's ethereal qualities with his keyboard setup, but his sound seemed to lack personality (Al Laughlin's phrases and effects sometimes made Samples songs Samples songs) and also, it wasn't very prominent in the overall mix. Also not so evident in the mix was Rob Somers acoustic guitar (1997 marks the first time in 6 years The Samples are a quintet).

Overall, it was a good time, and it is probably one of the best shows dedicated fans can think of, and it was also a great first–time experience for many.

Augusta Gallery's artistry dazzles

CHICAGO: MEMORIES AND FANTASIES, THE MALCOLM X SERIES
Augusta Savage Gallery
Through Oct. 22

The Augusta Savage Gallery opened its 1997–98 season recently, and this year the gallery is anticipating what will hopefully become yet another elegant display of vivid imagery.

It seems their wishes have already been answered.

Straight from the southern comforts of Virginia, Robert Henry Graham has ventured up north in hopes of exhibiting his works from the "Chicago: Memories and Fantasies" project. His "Malcolm X Series," which is currently being displayed at the Augusta Savage Gallery, is what Graham refers to as a smaller body of work from his main "Chicago" project.

Graham actually began this massive creation way back in the summer of 1992. Without any foresight into what his project was eventually going to erupt into, his complacent persona humbly painted one step at a time. Within the walls of his Virginia Tech studio — where he's also a professor of Art and Art History — Graham made an unprecedented discovery in his paintings. It was what some might call a divine intervention, meshed with unique and creative inspiration.

"Oh, no. Not planned... everything just came to me as I went along," Graham said in a recent interview.

Painted on canvas and gessoed materials, Graham has created a fascinating and very distinctive style — one in a million. His works take the art of painting into the next echelon, consisting of a multitude of layers ranging from at least 70–80 layers of color — with some even exceeding the 100–layer marker. This cumbersome painting process takes months on end to complete, leaving many nerve–racked and distraught after a few short weeks. Yet, Graham's determination has enabled him to complete these exemplary works of art.

"When I hit 20 layers I liked the effect... Then I put more layers down," Graham said.

Robert Graham's paintings touch a variety of genres including silhouettes, symbols, forms, abstracts and the city of Chicago, his highly concentrated theme. Through his countless layers, city scenes begin to speak. Not only can you see depth and clarity within the paintings, but it as if the painting is actually screaming out — a euphoric feeling from its car horns and the gritty. The Chicago scapes speak a pure feeling of homesickness — the heart really does lie within the home.

"I just wanted something for myself... " said Robert Henry Graham.

Gallery Hours: Monday & Tuesday 1–7 pm; Wednesday– Friday, 1–5 pm. Free Admission to all events. For more info. please call (413) 545–5177. Located in the New Africa House at the University of Massachusetts.

Garafolo & new movie: A perfect match

By Amy Selwyn
Associated Press

NEW YORK — It's all in the shoes.

Beneath a white terry cloth robe borrowed from a New York hotel, Janeane Garofalo sports a T-shirt and a pair of brown pants with uneven, slightly frayed hems. At 5-foot-1, Garofalo admits length can be a problem. But she's got a solution and, like the actress herself, it's eminently practical, if not a little offbeat. Really big shoes.

"I bought these for the Emmys," said Garofalo, holding up a black suede platform of considerable dimension. "I needed tall shoes because my pants were too long and I knew I was never going to get them hemmed. I just know me." She pauses, carefully examining the shoe. "Now I'm getting my money's worth out of 'em."

The shoes give Garofalo an additional four inches. But the former 33-year-old star of "Saturday Night Live," and scene-stealer from films including "Romy and Michele's High School Reunion" and "The Truth About Cats and Dogs," doesn't really need the extra stature.

Confident and quirky, Garofalo is now a bona fide star, appearing in the romantic comedy, "The Matchmaker."

But it's all relative for Garofalo. This half-Italian, half-Irish, New Jersey transplant says she may have the leading role but, hey, "The Matchmaker" is still a small film by Hollywood standards.

"It's my favorite one I've done so far," she said. "I even think I like my work in it. And being in Ireland was the one of the best experiences I've ever had. But I don't know what the expectations are for this film. I mean, I don't think it's going to be a big blockbuster."

Stardom produces mixed feelings in the one-time stand-up comedian.

"It was nice to be in every scene," Garofalo said. "But, there's also something fun about being the supporting role. The reviews don't hinge on you. You can steal the show. That's every character actor's dream — stealing the show."

The film's promotional poster is strategically placed in front of Garofalo.

"Ugh," the actress groans. "All day I've been looking at that thing, saying, 'Hi, Fatty'." Garofalo grimaces. "Oh yeah. 'Hul-lo Fatty.' That's exactly what I see." Then she giggles. "But my eyebrows look fabulous. Don't they?"

Make-up is definitely not high on Garofalo's to-do list.

"I can't deny that when I see pictures of myself I go, 'Oh, God!' But make-up and the gym and stuff take time, and that's not how I choose to spend my time. That's not really what I'm about."

Garofalo has a pretty strict code about staying true to herself. That means very few hems, no make-up, no stomach crunches at the gym.

What about playing "the babe" — acting like a bimbo and bearing her all?

Considering the question for a moment and pausing to light one in an endless stream of cigarettes, Garofalo twirls her dark brown hair and exhales slowly. Well, she says, certain lines must be drawn.

"I'll do a bimbo. Yeah. But, I will not show my... Believe me, nobody would want to see me without my clothes on. If they think they do, it's because they haven't seen me naked," she said.

There are also practical implications. "I mean, if I show everything, I can't just go into Starbucks. I can't go to my family reunion." Garofalo leans forward. "And my father! My father would absolutely die!" Then she smiles broadly. "It's easy for a guy to take off his shirt. But I will always have my shirt on. It's just personal.

"But the personal is also political," she adds. "Let's be honest. For a lot of actresses it's about wanting to show off. They may not have the chutzpa to carry a film without showing what they look like with their clothes off. For some, it's not their fault. I mean, they want to work. But there are other actresses who take their clothes off in every film they do. Why?"

Garofalo says the whole issue of who has and who hasn't got their shirt off can be boiled down to one word: power. "The male patriarchy in movie making doesn't require frontal nudity for men. And, until all the women get together, it's not going to change. Why should it?"

UMass takes on UVM at home

By Aaron M. Saykin

Although only a sophomore walk-on, Massachusetts men's tennis player Kevin Curley responded like a veteran on Wednesday, when he rallied from a one-set deficit to win the deciding match in a 4–3 nail-biting Minuteman victory over host Massachusetts Institute of Technology.

As players and coaches gathered around Curley, whose outcome would determine the victor of the match, they witnessed what UMass assistant Jason Bedford believes will be "big momentum gainer" for his team while they await their match against rival Vermont today.

"He [Curley] was a walk-on last year," Bedford said of his new anchor in the No. 6 singles position. "He handled the pressure really well, and grew from that."

Although his players may have taken the Engineers "a bit lightly," Bedford believes that a close contest may have given the Minutemen the much-needed proverbial kick in the behind.

"It's good to have one of those matches early on," Bedford said. "It will help us if we are in a similar position against Vermont."

As a result of their close contests in the recent past, Vermont and UMass have developed somewhat of a rivalry, making this afternoon's battle with the Catamounts an extremely important one for the Minutemen.

"Against Vermont, we really don't know what to expect," Bedford said of today's highly anticipated away match. "Our programs are similar in nature, and because of that, we are always jockeying for position."

Also posting huge victories for UMass against MIT were No. 1 singles player Todd Cheney, who also fought off a one-set deficit, topping Engineer Jim Matysczak 2-6, 6-3, and 6-1; Rob Manchester at No. 2 singles; and Patrick Slyman at No. 5 singles and at No. 2 doubles with senior Alex Aller.

Aller's recent return to the line-up at the No. 4 singles spot is expected to give the Minutemen a big boost today against Vermont.

UMass tries to stand tall at Short

■ Men's XC looks to grow

By Scott Hamill
Collegian Correspondent

After a disappointing performance last weekend in New York, the Massachusetts cross-country team travels to Lehigh University tomorrow for the Paul Short Invitational.

UMass finished 11th out of 12 last week in the invitational division of the Meet of Champions run in the Bronx.

This invitational field is made up of 32 teams, by far the biggest field the Minutemen have been in this season. Among those teams are eight nationally ranked schools. UMass coach Ken O'Brien sees No. 7 North Carolina State and No. 9 Georgetown as the two favorites.

Last year, the Minutemen placed seventh in the Paul Short Invitational, but this is a much-changed UMass squad.

"We had an experienced team last year, a very good group. It's difficult to duplicate that performance, especially with this field," O'Brien said.

"The meet gives us more experience, in terms of shear numbers," O'Brien said. "We've also got four A-10 teams in the meet."

LaSalle, St. Joseph's, Rhode Island and Duquesne are among the field.

Although he has a young team, he is still optimistic with his group going into the meet. According to the coach, they've had a good week of practice again, but O'Brien has yet to see the Minutemen translate that into a good showing at a meet.

"Each place they go, with the exception of one or two guys, is a new course, a new meet, and a new field," O'Brien said. "More experience will get us closer to consistency, but a new venue every week makes that tough."

■ Women in for tough run

By Jim Eltringham
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's cross-country team will return to action this Saturday at the Paul Short Invitational in Bethlehem, Pa. — a race that promises to be the squad's toughest of the season thus far.

UMass coach Julie LaFreniere is treating this race as a barometer for the Minutemen saying, "it should be a good indication of where we stand." The 28-team event includes some hefty competition, including nationally ranked teams and Atlantic 10 opponents.

"There are some very strong teams," LaFreniere said.

Despite the multitude of teams, LaFreniere plans to focus on how her team's scores compare to those of certain other schools, such as Army, Brown, and North Carolina State.

"Our runners have to step up a notch and run with them... I want them to try to squeeze more out of themselves," LaFreniere said.

Also of interest will be the performance of Nicole Way. According to LaFreniere, Way "looked good in practice and... should finish closer to our top five." LaFreniere hopes the runners will cross the finish line "in tighter packs."

UMass' last meet was two weeks ago, when they won the Vermont Invitational with five runners finishing in the top ten. Despite the solid team effort, LaFreniere continues to emphasize the importance of this Saturday's competition. For example, the Minutewomen will wake up at 6 a.m. for a traditional two mile run in preparation for the 10:30 a.m. race.

You better believe it.

When you bring me a 21-year old kid who has found the cure for cancer or a remedy for the AIDS virus, then all the corporate big-wigs and money grubbing agents in the world can feel free to toss around all that cash that somehow, they just can't put to good use.

Toss it to the people who have earned it.

Garnett has only been to one All Star game, has yet to average 20 points a game in a season or win a championship.

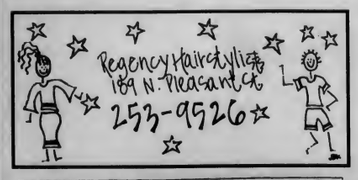
On the other hand, he could lead a once lowly joke of an expansion team to glory, and build a new dynasty in the NBA. He could become a Jordan-esque presence and boost the hyper-marketed league to an even more absurd level. He could change the game of basketball for future generations.

He could go down as one of the greatest players in the history of the NBA.

He might, though, just go down. Fall to the floor with a freak knee injury in a meaningless exhibition game and find out that his blossoming career is over.

Can you imagine all that money going to a 20-year-old kid sitting in the game room of his palatial mansion in the hills with a fluffy pillow propping up his bum knee, watching a basketball game?

Can you imagine Garnett earning more money while vacationing in the Bahamas than I will in a couple decades of writing about high-paid athletes?



I wish I couldn't imagine that. But I can.

game plan. However, with the new leadership under offensive coordinator Bob Colbert, UMass is attempting to establish a legitimate passing game, led by tight end Kerry Taylor.

"We need to keep people guessing," Hodges said. "We have to have UNH thinking that we can throw the ball. Taylor is a big part of that."

For the most part, the Minutemen's passing was successful on Saturday. Jeff Smith passed for two touchdown passes in the red zone. Both of those passes went to Taylor, who despite the two scores had only nine yards receiving.

Last year, when these two teams met UNH stomped on the Minutemen 40-7. The Wildcats star running back Jerry Azumah ran for 210 yards and one touchdown on 25 carries. He also picked up 82 yards in the air. For the second year in a row, Azumah was awarded the Bill Knight trophy, which goes to the most valuable player in the UNH–UMass game. The Minutemen were held to a season-low 193 yards of offense.

"We didn't do anything right," said Hodges of last year's contest. "They had a great day."

Tomorrow, the Minutemen will attempt to answer back the thumping they received last year. The problem is still Azumah. He is one of the top natural running backs in Division I-AA football and can control any game that he's in. At 5-foot 10-inch, 188 pounds, Azumah powers his way up the field. He's averaging 95.3 yards per game this season along with nine catches.

Wednesday, UNC defeated Wake Forest, 3–1.

"Wake will be tough," Shea said. "They play against ACC opponents all the time, and they are another ranked opponent for us. Plus, the ACC is one of the strongest conferences in the country."

Wake Forest's major strength comes in the form of Jenny Everett, who has 13 goals and 28 points to lead the Deacons. And an added strength comes from the schedule.

"They definitely have the advantage of rest, because they aren't playing two games in a row like we are," Shea said.

Regardless of the opponents, Shea said, the emphasis this weekend is on UMass.

"If we concentrate on what we need to do, the end result will take care of itself," Shea said. "This weekend gives us the opportunity to see what we can do and what we need to do as a team.

"They're ready," she said. "It's easy to get up for Carolina."

A–10 slate starts for UMass

Massachusetts to host St. Joe's, Temple

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Correspondent

Although the hope for an Atlantic 10 division crown will ride on an upcoming five-game homestand, the path to the head of the class will begin this weekend, as the Massachusetts men's soccer team will square off against St. Joseph's and Temple in crucial conference matchups.

"We have two tough games this weekend. We have to be ready to play," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "We decide who wins or loses the game, not the other team."

The Hawks of St. Joseph's will be the first opponent of the weekend to visit Totman Field. UMass will battle St. Joe's this afternoon at 3:30 p.m. The Hawks will be looking to avenge last year's heartbreaking 1–0 loss to the Minutemen in Philadelphia.

"They are a pesky team. They will come at you," Koch said. "They are a physical, hard-running team. We have to move the ball around quickly on the ground and make sure that all of our passing options are open, because our time with the ball will be limited."

Next up to visit Totman will be Temple, which makes its appearance Sunday afternoon at 1 p.m. The Owls were the doormats of the A–10 last season, and the Minutemen easily disposed of them by a 4–0 score in Philly.

This year, however, is a different story. Temple has regained its winning ways, and is now ranked 19th in the country. Sunday's game will be no cakewalk, and Koch is well aware of that.

"They have a few goal scorers who can put the ball in the back of the net," Koch said. "We have to control their two front runners, and we have to try to have our midfielders control the midfield."

Minutemen Notes: No matter how well UMass plays this weekend, or how well they do the rest of the season, it seems the Minutemen have a bright future ahead of them. With their 26-member lineup, only four of them are seniors, and out of the 47 total points (15 goals, 17 assists) that UMass has scored this season, 74 percent has come from their underclassmen... freshman forward Seth Lilburn leads the team in scoring with 11 points on three goals and five assists, scoring the gamewinner at Duquesne last Sunday in the Minutemen's 2–1 victory... senior forward Mike Butler is second in team scoring with nine points on three goals and three assists... combined with Lilburn, juniors Jake Brodsky and Paul Corcoran, sophomores Gavin Hewitt and James Redmond and fellow frosh Matt Christy and Mike Purcell have scored 35 out of the team's 47 points.

either sophomore forward Emma Kurowski, junior forward Sophie Lecot or senior defender Erica Iverson.

But for now, UMass has to concentrate on re-tuning their game. The Minutewomen have slacked off from their traditional possession game and have been playing a less effective long-ball strategy.

"We've just got to clean it up and get the game on the ground," said Rudy. "Our game has become too counter-oriented."

On Saturday, UMass faces St. Joseph's, and despite last year's record of 6–11–1, the Hawks — in only their second season as a varsity sport — have equalled last season's total win record with a 6–1–1 start.

In preparation for St. Joe's Finnesey Field, which has an artificial turf surface, the Minutewomen have been practicing on Richard F. Garber Field to adjust to the speedier conditions.

"The Hawks are very physical," Rudy said. "They're heavy hitters, heavy on attack and they are very good in the air. They've earned six yellow cards in the past two games."

On Sunday, UMass looks to take on Temple, who is suffering through a 3–7 start with only nine goals in 10 games. Their two freshmen forwards, sisters Julie and Emily Marx, are out for the game. The Owl's leading scorers are junior forward Jessica Stahlin, freshman midfielder Julie Marx, and sophomore forward Lori Brennan, all tied at four points a piece.

butions. They have grown together as a team and will continue doing so as they lose only two players to graduation this year and none the next. Although those players are outside hitter Lesley Nolan and middle blocker Michelle Paciorek, the younger players have already had plenty of experiences in which they've had to step up their game.

The countdown continues for Paciorek. She now needs just six block assists to surpass Dionne Nash's school record of 263. Paciorek broke graduate Rachel Sky's record of 72 block solos last weekend, getting her 73rd in a win over Duquesne.

Freshman setter Jennifer Drennan is on the way to another record of her own. Drennan broke the UMass single-match assist record in a win over Dayton and is currently on pace to break the UMass freshman record for assists in a season. Drennan leads the nation's freshmen in assists and is 10th overall.

Sophomore outside hitter Kari Hogancamp collected 17 more digs Wednesday to raise her nation leading total to 198. Senior outside hitter Lesley Nolan has also had her way to becoming one of the top hitters in the nation and currently ranks sixth.

Sophomore middle blocker Jill Meyers was named A–10 Player of the Week collecting a career-high 34 kills against Dayton. Meyers is currently sixth on the UMass career kill list.

Horoscopes

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You may be resistant to any new ideas that come your way today, but what travels a long distance to get to you is certainly worth consideration.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Now is the time for you to take advantage of an unusual offer made to you by someone who has a hidden agenda. You should remain safe.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You are far too critical of those who are only out to help you. Be more generous with your praise and more willing to say thank you.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You may find yourself succumbing to a temptation that is extremely dangerous. Take care that you don't make a life–changing error today.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Your attraction to someone other than that special someone is nothing to be ashamed of, but you'll want to think twice before acting on it.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — This is a good day for you to take a more aggressive approach to requests for money and other forms of support. Many are likely to oblige you.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You may be seeking a place for something special today. By day's end, you'll realize that you needn't be quite so protective.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You don't want to fall into any normal categories today, so you must take a chance on behavior that is far from expected. Can you do it?

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Getting your job done today is as easy as one–two–three, provided you have defined it with some degree of care and specificity.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — A creative outlet will allow you to tap into unexplored energy and instincts. With care, you can develop a whole new skill.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — This is a good day to put plans in motion — but have you made any? If not, take the time to prepare with great care; tend to all details.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You may be asking questions today that put others on the defensive. You may be onto something; use care while solving this mystery.

Garnett's contract puts athlete salaries in prospective

If I get a good, solid job in my field, it's going to take me about 21 years to make a million bucks.

Twenty years.

That's $50,000 a year for all you math majors — and all you journalism majors out there know how opiimistic I'm being.

But I'll be okay, ya' know... money isn't everything. Right?

Well, if that's truly the case, then Kevin Garnett's gonna have to rent a U–Haul to carry his big bag of nothing around.

Garnett — a budding, but not–yet proven superstar in the NBA — this week signed a contract with the Minnesota Timberwolves according $125 million to the 6–foot, 10–inch swingman over the next six years. He should be able to afford that U–Haul.

Did I mention he's only 21 years old?

Did I mention he turned down a contract for $103 million?

Fred Hutchinson, Jr. goes
Around the Horn

The kid's 21!

How old are you?

Well I'm 20, and hoping that it only takes me two decades to make my first million. Ya' wanna know how long it's going to take everyone's new best friend, Kev, to make his first million from the new contract he has safely tucked away in the back pocket of his jeans?

You really don't, but I'm gonna tell ya' anyway.

It'll take Garnett, 17 days, 9 hours and 7 minutes to make his first mill... for playing basketball.

By now, we all have gotten used to seeing oodles of zeros lining up behind the dollar signs that define professional sports these days. So, we're not really surprised anymore. It's not shocking to see superstars surrender their integrity to the power of the almighty green back.

Passing the buck (literally and figuratively) and signing a shoe contract have taken the place of a good bounce pass and lacing up the sneaks loyally for one team over a career.

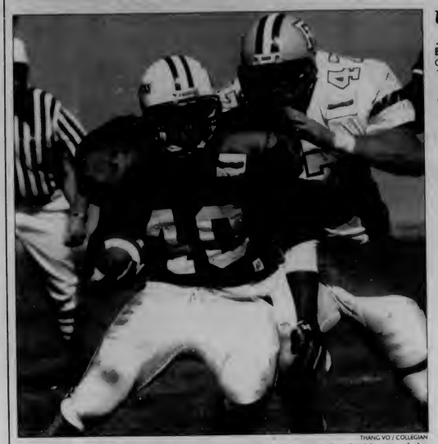
Sports have become a business, and athletes have become businessmen.

So, we're definitely not taken aback any longer, but it seems we're disgusted, or at least we ought to be.

I mean the kid, and he is only a kid, is about to "earn" almost $21 million for the next six years; and when those six years are up his contract will inevitably get exponentially bigger.

Yeah, you heard me. Bigger!

That's how it happens. Once you're up there, getting paid kajillions of dollars, you don't have to come back down. It's not based on performance anymore — it's all about your reputation and how good your agent is.



Garnett, mind you, is a tremendous athletic talent with unlimited potential in the game of basketball. In addition, he is adequately articulate and for the most part speaks intelligently, obviously well–schooled by his agent and his P.R. staff in the ways of self–promotion.

But, does a 21–year old kid ever deserve to make $125 million in one lump sum?

Minutemen look for two in row against UNH

UM looks for revenge of 40–7 loss

Standout freshman tailback Marcel Shipp (No. 40) goes head–to–head with one of the best runners in the country, Jerry Azumah, when UM takes on UNH tomorrow.

Sequels are always popular.

People love to see whether or not the sequel is as good as the original. Look at Holyfield/Tyson II or A Very Brady Sequel — both quality remakes.

So tomorrow, the Massachusetts football team (1–3, 1–3 Atlantic 10) kicks off against New Hampshire (1–3, 1–2) in what UMass coach Mike Hodges hopes to be "Homecoming II" — considering Hodges' success during Homecoming weekend.

After defeating Rhode Island, last week, the Minutemen's Homecoming record increased to 6–0 under Hodges.

"It's a good time for alumni to come back and see the team. The guys know it's an important weekend. We did the best we could to show them what we have," Hodges said.

With the Minutemen coming off of their first win of the season, and the Wildcats suffering a loss to No. 16 Stephen F. Austin 17–14 last weekend, UMass will attempt to get this season back on track with its second win in a row.

"We'd like to get to 2–3 and get a streak going," Hodges said. "We have plenty of reasons to play well."

Led by freshman tailback Marcel Shipp, the Minutemen came off their most successful running game of the season with 189 yards. Shipp led the team with 82 yards rushing on 22 carries. He now has 257 yards on the season, averaging 5.2 yards per carry with two touchdowns.

"(Shipp) is playing well," Hodges said. "He's going to continue to improve. He's strong and aggressive. The more he plays the more he'll improve."

Dan Healey, who stepped into the full–back role in place of the injured Jamie Holston, drove in a powerful 49 yards on 15 carries. Healey is still scheduled as tomorrow's starter. Shipp, who also ran a few plays at fullback will start at the tail–back spot and take most of the carries throughout the game. Jim Pizano, who ran for 49 yards on Saturday will back up Shipp.

The Minutemen, slowly but surely, are improving on their 144.8 yards rushing per game. As history shows, this team plays better when rushing closer to 200 yards per game. That's always been their

Massachusetts V-Ball to host Virginia Tech in Cage

By Jamie Jee

The Massachusetts volleyball team is at home tonight, taking on Virginia Tech at the Curry Hicks Cage at 7 p.m.

The Minutewomen hope to bounce back with a win after their first conference defeat came Wednesday against defending Atlantic 10 Conference champion Rhode Island.

The Minutewomen will play the second game of its season–high five–match homestand, which began Wednesday. Virginia Tech enters tonight's match with a 7–7 record, 2–2 in conference play. UMass is 3–1 all time versus the Hokies and won both games last year.

"We need to keep the ball in play more," Massachusetts coach Bonnie Kenny said. "Better passing will also be key for us."

The Hokies are led by junior middle blocker Corrie Bundy and sophomore setter Britton Julian. Bundy leads the team in both kills and hitting percentage, while Britton has collected nearly all the team's assists.

Virginia Tech is coming off a loss to A–10 rival Dayton, a team UMass beat earlier in the season.

UMass dropped to 4–1 In the A–10, 8–6 overall with their 1–3 loss to URI. The Rams wasted no time in utilizing their speed and quick hitting attacks as they took the first game 15–9. UMass battled back, however, and grabbed the second game, 17–15. Rhode Island then showed why they're the defending conference champs and won the next two games 15–7 and 15–11.

"At times I think we made some poor decisions as when we tried to force something that wasn't there," Kenny said. "We usually play better than that but we knew we wouldn't see that on Rhode Island's side."

Sophomore middle blocker Jill Meyers never fully got into the game and the team had trouble going to the middle with her as much as they wanted to.

"Rhode Island played well and they were simply better than us for this game," Kenny said. "Hopefully, though, we'll be playing them two more times."

If the Minutewomen play up to their potential and win the necessary games in the A–10 Tournament, coach Kenny will indeed get her wish.

Although this team is young, several of these youngsters have been posting serious stats and making crucial contri-

Minutewomen battle Tar Heels

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

In collegiate athletics, most teams would be happy with two All–Americans on their roster at any one time.

But most teams aren't the North Carolina field hockey squad.

"They have five All–Americans, an Olympic team member, an Olympic alternate and a number of veteran squad members all returning," said Massachusetts coach Patty Shea, whose team faces the No. 3 Tar Heels (6–2) and Wake Forest (6–6) this weekend in Chapel Hill, N.C.

"They are the two–time defending national champions. That explains it all."

The names speak for themselves. Cindy Werley was a member of the 1996 Olympic squad, Jana Withrow is one of the nation's stingiest goaltenders, Joy Driscoll was a 1996 Olympic alternate and Nancy Pellegreen is a member of the U.S. National team.

But neither Shea nor the Minutewomen (5–4), see the challenge as an intimidating one. "We match up well with them," she said. "They play a possession game and they have a lot of speed. But we have played some great games in practice and we are very ready."

Still, the coach is realistic.

"Of course, they can sub players in and not lose anything out on the field," Shea said. "They have so many weapons. We will have to play a perfect game to beat them.

"But, at the same time, we have nothing to lose," she said. "There is no pressure on us. They have all the pressure, because as defending champ they have a bulls–eye on their back — everyone tries to beat them."

So far this season only two teams have been successful in that quest — No. 1 Old Dominion, a team that constantly battles the Tar Heels for field hockey supremacy, and No. 2 Virginia, UNC's toughest in–conference competition.

"Yeah, they've lost," Shea said. "But losses aren't necessarily a bad thing. You can learn a lot from a loss and possibly be much better in the next game."

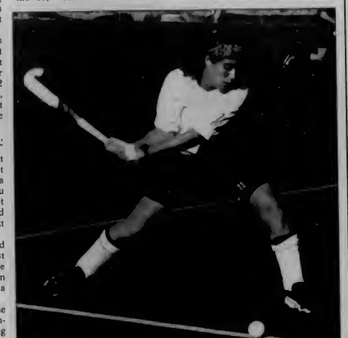
Saturday 1 p.m.

The Minutewomen, have gained much from their losses (their last two came two weeks ago) and have put themselves in good position in the Atlantic 10 conference as a result.



"We still need to work on some small things," Shea said. "Our timing has improved and we are using space well. We have to concentrate on our game. We can't put all of our focus on them, though we still have to respect them."

Werley commands the most respect. The Tar Heel senior leads the nation in points with 47. Shea played with Werley in the Summer Games in Atlanta last year, but that doesn't necessarily translate into a scouting advantage.

"I know her style and some of her moves," Shea said. "But she improves every time she steps on the field, so she'll probably be that much better when we play her."

Sunday the Minutewomen meet another Atlantic Coast Conference opponent in the Demon Deacons.

Gibson to help improve prestige of Hall of Fame

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

Don Gibson, the newly anointed head of operations at the Basketball Hall of Fame, spoke to a group of enthused students at the Campus Center yesterday. He was hired this past January, and has been working to build a name for the Hall ever since.

"We want to get out to the people, and present them with an entertaining and educational experience that they will remember," Gibson said.

In the year 2000, Springfield will be the home of a brand new complex which will hold an improved Hall of Fame museum and various other attractions, such as restaurants and a theatre.

"This project Is not only meaningful to basketball, but to the entire community of Springfield. This building will help In revitalizing the city," Gibson said.

To create a site of this magnitude, the Hall received $25 million from the state of Massachusetts, and raised an additional $10.7 million of their own.

Gibson could be the key to the success of the Hall when this building comes around. He has taken a hands–on approach to all aspects of operation.

"We need consistency in our marketing approach. We want to be more appealing to all age groups," Gibson said. "We want people to realize Springfield is actually a very convenient and appealing location for a museum of this magnitude."

In addition to the vast amount of basketball concentration, Gibson hopes to add an element of arts and entertainment when the new building opens.

He described plans of incorporating musicians and cinematic aspects to the environment of the Hall.

This all relates back to Gibson's master plan of making a name for the Basketball Hall of Fame and the city of Springfield.

"Right now, we are still trying to figure out who to appeal to. We have basketball fans in the area that do not even know we are here," Gibson said. "I have to change that immediately, so we will have a strong following when the new facility opens up."

One of Gibson's approaches has been to bring the Hall of Fame to the people, so to speak. Last week, the Hall put together an interactive booth at the Big E. Bringing the Hall out in the open — to the people — has helped conquer lack of exposure.

The presentation Gibson gave to UMass students left them with a great impression of what he was trying to accomplish.

"I realized this was an opportunity of a lifetime. I have a chance to build this thing from the ground up. This is the most exciting project I have ever been involved with," Gibson said.

Harrods withdraws controversial book

LONDON (AP) — The controversial Andrew Morton biography of Princess Diana was withdrawn from sale at Harrods department store on orders from its owner, Mohamed Al Fayed, whose son died with the princess five weeks ago.

The book, in which Morton says Diana was the main source for the painful details of her early life and marriage to Prince Charles, is due for widespread publication today.

A few London stores put several hundred copies of Diana, Her True Story — In Her Own Words on sale Saturday. Dillons said it sold all 4,000 of the books it made available at five central outlets.

Waterstone's book stores, which has a branch at Harrods, also began selling the book, a revised edition of Morton's 1992 bestseller Diana: Her True Story.

"It was withdrawn on Saturday," Al Fayed spokesman Michael Cole said yesterday. "Mr. Al Fayed gave the order as soon as he found out the book was on sale.

"He didn't want the book in his shop because he saw it as a blatant attempt to gain money out of an awful tragedy for which he is still in grieving."

Weather delays astronaut's return

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. (AP) — After 144 days away from his family and planet, astronaut Michael Foale had to wait a little longer yesterday to return from Mir aboard space shuttle Atlantis.

Although the weather was good enough for an unmanned rocket to blast off with a communication satellite, the wind was too gusty and the clouds were too thick for Atlantis to land safely. NASA ordered the seven–member shuttle crew to stay up an extra orbit and try for a touchdown later in the evening.

Foale couldn't wait to see his wife and two young children and to dig into some pizza and pasta. Also on his wish list: beer and "a lot of chocolate."

Foale's 4 1/2 months aboard Russia's aging space station were often trying and sometimes downright scary.

A cargo ship similar to the one launched to Mir from Kazakstan yesterday plowed into the station in June, one month after Foale arrived.

The 40–year–old astrophysicist — whose mission is exceeded on the U.S. side only by Shannon Lucid's 188–day Mir tour In 1996 — lost half his science experiments and almost all his personal belongings in the crash. As a result, he's coming home pretty much empty–handed; the charms he took up for his wife and friends are sealed in the ruptured lab.

Escort Service starts new route in response to safety concerns

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

Beginning this semester students using the Escort Service no longer need to call the University of Massachusetts Public Safety Department. Instead they can wait at one of the 10 designated stops in the new fixed route.

Last semester, members from Public Safety, Student Government Association (SGA) and the Pioneer Valley Transit Authority (PVTA) formed the Escort Summit Committee after student complaints over the effectiveness of the Escort Service program.

"A big problem was the Escort Service was becoming so popular that it was becoming hard to meet the student's demands," said UMass Police Chief John Luippold. "We were providing over 10,000 rides per academic year."

Through surveys, students were asked to comment on the strengths and weaknesses of Escort Service.

"We were looking for common themes about why student didn't like the Escort Service. Once we gathered those themes, we came up with recommendations on how to improve those problems and began to implement those changes," Luippold said.

One major issue that was repeated often was the importance of "knowing when a van was going to be at a certain point. That had a lot to do with why we went with a fixed schedule this year," said Al Byam Transit Manager for PVTA.

Many other complaints consisted of students not being able to get through when they called for an escort, and once they did students found themselves waiting for a long period of time for a van to show up, Byam explained.

The fixed route begins in the Southwest Residential Area Horseshoe and makes nine other stops: the corner of Massachusetts Avenue and Sunset Avenue; Blue Wall; parking lot 43; Eastman Lane; Cashin Residence Hall; Grayson Residence Hall; Chadbourne Residence Hall; Wheeler Residence Hall; Hampshire House then back to Southwest.

Each route is estimated to take 20–25 minutes.

"With this fixed route we are able move more individuals around campus in a shorter amount of time," Luippold said.

Another advantage of the fixed route is the decrease of in– coming phone calls to the public safety department.

"The fixed route cuts down drastically on the number of calls coming in to the police station. This allows student dispatchers to focus more of their attention on their other jobs as well," said Public Safety Officer Michael Rucks. "Students seem to be liking the service better this year because they know where and when the van is going to be there."

Freshman Alyssa Manzi said she likes the convenience of the Escort Service but "the only thing that I don't like so far about Escort Service is that I have to walk from Furcolo Hall to Northeast by myself," she said.

Manzi attends a night class until 9 p.m. on Tuesday nights.

Another student, freshman political science major Elizabeth Sullivan said she takes the Escort Service because she refuses to walk on the "rape trail" that connects Sylvan Residential Area to Orchard Hill Residential Area.

"I have walked there before and it is very creepy. There needs to be a lot more light before I'll use it again," she said.

"So far this semester the number of complaints from students about waiting long periods of time have gone down significantly, "said Luippold.

The Public Safety department wants to stress the Escort Service is specifically designed for students who feel their safety may be endangered, not for groups.

"Some students think of us as a taxi and that our job is just to drive students around. We are not a taxi, we are here for safety reasons," said Justin Ononibaku, an escort driver.

Although the number of complaints have decreased, public safety officials have no way of determining if the numbers of students using the service have increased.

Rucks said "because of it being a fixed route we don't take names anymore because students do not have to call for a ride.

"Drivers may get counters soon so they can keep track of the number of students they are transporting," he said.

Ononibaku, who said he has seen an increase in students using the service, thinks there needs to be a second van on the fixed route.

"Currently there is only one van and often the van is filled and students are forced to wait until the next round," he said.

"This semester the changes that have been made are being tested and we will modify those changes when we talk about what worked well and what didn't work well," said Luippold.

In addition to the fixed route service there are three other escort programs available; walking escorts, support escorts and library escorts.

Eqbal Ahmad honored by Chomsky in keynote address

By Jonathan Liberty
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — Economic growth, protectionism, and the prospects of the Third World were the main subjects of Noam Chomsky's keynote address Friday night at Hampshire College's Robert Crown Center.

Chomsky, a social critic, political analyst and professor of linguistics at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, began the symposium titled, "Border Crossings: the commitments of a political intellectual: a celebration of the life of Eqbal Ahmad."

The symposium, which took place on Oct. 3–4, honored Ahmad, who is retiring from Hampshire after teaching for 15 years as professor of politics and Middle East studies.

After being introduced by Hampshire President Gregory S. Prince and co–Dean of the School of Social Science Margaret Cerullo, Chomsky gave a 75 minute lecture to a standing–room–only–crowd of over 2,000 persons.

Chomsky began by citing a recent article in the New York Times, titled, "Making Sure War Crimes Aren't Forgotten." Both the Clinton administration and Madeleine Albright have created policy to "see that the atrocities of war do not fade into history," as reported in the Times.

But Chomsky pointed out that Clinton and Albright forgot to give credit to a previous suggestion made in the Journal of International Affairs in 1971 by Ahmad. According to Chomsky, Ahmad is the brain child of this war crime policy.

"Eqbal was bitterly condemned, while Clinton has been highly praised," Chomsky said. "Their policies differed in fundamentals."

Chomsky said Eqbal wanted criminals to be brought to justice, while Clinton's policy was restricted to a carefully selected category of crimes charged to someone else's account.

"I'm not surprised that Clinton went unchallenged," Chomsky said. "And there is remarkable danger in this unchallenged power."

After a brief round of applause, Chomsky discussed the radical shift of economic power, which is deepening the divide between rich and poor both nationally and internationally.

"In any third world country, there is obscene wealth and privilege, modest survival and real misery," Chomsky said. "There must be a willingness to consider questions which can prevent renewal."

According to Chomsky, due to the divide of rich and poor, while he was speaking, 1,000 children will die from disease, while 2,000 will die from childbirth in India.

Also in India, due to the lack of gender equality, 30–40 million women would be alive, Chomsky said.

But Chomsky pointed out that these cultural maladies do not evade the United States. In terms of hunger and child poverty, the U.S. ranks with Cuba.

"The technical term for countries with a high rank in economic growth and low human development is an economic mirror," Chomsky said.

Chomsky continued his analysis of the Americas, comparing the differing development of the North and South, while discussing the cause for these differences.

"Europe developed, and those countries who escaped Europe, only the United States, Japan and its colonies truly developed," he said.

"Compulsory liberalization led to the delay of development in the South," Chomsky said. "Every developing country radically violated neo–liberal principles."

Chomsky used the example of India and England to illustrate the lack of Anita Hill speaks at Mt. Holyoke

By Juliette Doro
Collegian Staff

Six years after testifying in front of the Senate Judiciary Committee that Justice Clarence Thomas sexually harassed her, Anita Hill said she is ready to tell her story.

Hill was welcomed to Chapin Auditorium at Mount Holyoke College on Thursday by a standing ovation from the audience. The lecture was in honor of the sixth anniversary of the Five College Women's Studies Research Center.

"I always feel good in a university community because of the hope it symbolizes," she said, greeting the audience of 1,500 people.

As Hill began the lecture, she said her life before the trial was boring. She had a happy childhood on an isolated farm in Oklahoma. Although it was a hard life, she said it was rich in experience. She read passages from her book, Speaking Truth to Power.

She said she went on to college at Oklahoma State University and then Yale Law School. After working in Washington D.C., she began teaching at the University of Oklahoma, where, she said, her life was back on track.

"Then 1991 happened and overnight my life was changed," Hill said.

Hill spoke about the dichotomy of her life since the trial, reading letters out loud to illustrate the split between those who support her and those who continue to accuse her of lying.

She read a letter from a woman who wrote to tell her she hoped to raise her son to respect Hill.

"I needed to hear from people like this. I needed to know there were people who cared about me and this issue," Hill said. "Many of the other comments differ dramatically."

Hill lighthearredly read a letter from an author who criticized her. Some of the writer's comments were, "you rely on the politics of race and sex to perpetuate your leftist agenda. You know you perpetuate racism and sexism in this way."

Amid the audience's laughter, she read several other letters, one said that Hill was "dead set against traditional family values and work ethics."

Hill said that the author of those letters was afraid of the social change needed to end sexism and racism.

"Social change is necessary if the law's promises are to be fulfilled," she said.

Hill said it wouldn't be easy, and she hopes that her life is an example of the difficulty in speaking out against sexism. She told the audience that she would do it all over again.

"I recommend to you a life of challenge over a life of complacency; rather than simply talking you can do something about it."

After the lecture, Hill signed her book. The lecture was co–sponsored by the Five College Women's Studies Research Center and the Odyssey Bookshop in South Hadley.

Said discusses world cultures, pays tribute to Eqbal Ahmad

By Tamar Carroll
Collegian Staff

Noted author and intellect Edward Said spoke about alternative visions of the U.S. role in world politics Friday afternoon at Bowker Auditorium.

Lee Edwards, Dean of the College of Arts and Sciences, introduced Said to the packed crowd of 750–plus students, faculty and community members.

"I am unbelievably delighted and terribly honored to be introducing Edward Said to you," Edwards said.

"He is one of the outstanding intellectuals of the 20th century and he is someone who has changed the way we think about the formation of cultures and folkloric relations," Edwards said. "His work has featured prominently In our heated debates over the canon, the curriculum and the character of liberal education in a multicultural, capitalist society."

Said, a professor of English and comparative literature at Columbia University, is the author of several books on the Israeli/Palestinian conflict, including After the Last Sky: Palestinian Lives. He has also written extensively on the role of cultures and ways of looking at the world, the topic of his 1993 book, Culture and Imperialism.

In his lecture, entitled "Clash of Civilizations or Clash of Definitions?" Said criticized Samuel Huntington's view of world politics as outlined in his essay "The Clash of Civilizations," published in 1993 in The Journal of Foreign Affairs, and in his recent book, The Clash of Civilizations and the Remaking of World Order.

Said argued that Huntington's view of world politics in the post–Cold War era as a battle between Western and non– Western civilizations was nothing short of a "prescription for war," which ignores the complex interrelations of cultures in today's world.

"What Huntington means by this new style of politics is the principle clash between Western and non–Western cultures," Said said. "The core of Huntington's vision is an unceasing clash of cultures that slides into the space of political ideologies during the Cold War, so that, in fact, the Cold War continues."

Said attacked Huntington's formula for the engineered spread of Western culture as the base of U.S. foreign policy.

"His survey of what the West must do is a very aggressive prescription, a very interventionalist attitude to get these groups to become Western," Said said. "It is a resolutely chauvinistic stance... a manual in the art of maintaining the war frame mind–set of Americans."

Huntington's thinking, Said argued, ignores progress in cross–cultural relations and understanding and is fundamentally biased.

"Huntington is quite misleading," Said said. "He scants enormous advances in our understanding of how

Netanyahu defends Israel's right to counter terrorism

By Hilary Appelman
Associated Press

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's government broke its silence yesterday on the botched assassination attempt against a Hamas leader, defending Israel's right to fight terrorism "without compromise."

The bungled Sept. 25 attack on Khalid Mashaal in Jordan has damaged peacemaking and thrown relations with Israel's friendliest Arab ally, Jordan, into crisis. In Israel on Sunday, there were calls for an official inquiry, and an opposition lawmaker demanded Netanyahu's resignation.

In the attack, two men carrying Canadian passports injected poison into the Hamas leader's ear as he entered his office in Amman. Mashaal was hospitalized with breathing problems but recovered.

In its first public comment on the attempt, Netanyahu's government stopped short of confirming that Israeli agents were responsible.

But in a Cabinet statement, Netanyahu called Mashaal "the No. 1 figure in Hamas, responsible for the murder of innocent Israeli citizens," and said "the government's obligation is to protect the lives of its citizens and to fight terror without compromise."

Netanyahu adviser David Bar-Illan indicated that negotiations were under way with Jordan over the return of the two attackers, now in Jordanian custody.

"We'd rather not refer to the specific case as long as the negotiations are going on," he told reporters. "We're not discussing the case as long as there are Israelis in custody in Jordan."

Bar-Illan said Mashaal was responsible for activating the Hamas cells that carried out two deadly suicide bombings in Jerusalem this summer.

In protest of the use of Canadian passports in the attack, Canada recalled its ambassador from Israel. Jordan's King Hussein, in an interview published Sunday in the London-based Al-Hayat newspaper, called the attack "a reckless act carried out by a party that has no faith in peace."

Hussein did not specifically tie Israel to the assassination attempt, but insisted that Israel respect the 1994 peace treaty between the two countries. "I personally can't figure out what the Israeli prime minister is thinking of, and this worries me a lot," he said.

Despite his harsh words, the king accepted the credentials yesterday of Israel's new ambassador to Jordan, Oded Eran, in a ceremony scheduled before last week's attack.

According to Israel news media, Israel sent a doctor to Jordan after the attack with a drug that neutralized the poison. If Jordan had not received the antidote, Hussein said, "We would have taken plenty of measures."

Israeli reports described Israel's release last week of Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, Hamas' ailing spiritual leader, as part of a swap for the two men held by Jordan. The king denied such a deal.

Jordanian and Hamas officials said Yassin would be flown to his home in the Gaza Strip today, but Israeli officials refused to confirm this.

There were reports out of Jordan that Israel would also release dozens of Palestinian prisoners, including several Hamas leaders, as part of a deal to get back the alleged Israeli agents. Hamas was reportedly demanding the release of 22 Hamas prisoners, including some involved in planning suicide bombings in Israel.

The assassination attempt appeared likely to set back Israel's effort to get Yasser Arafat to crack down on Hamas. Arafat told Associated Press Television that he would talk with Yassin and other leaders "to strengthen more and more the Palestinian unity and the Palestinian coordination and cooperation in facing all these challenges."

CNN, quoting unidentified sources, said yesterday that Hamas had offered Israel a 10-year halt in attacks before the assassination attempt. But Abdel Aziz Rantisi, a senior Hamas official in Gaza, denied the report.

A special session of Israel's Parliament was called for next week to discuss the assassination attempt. Labor lawmaker Haim Ramon demanded an official inquiry and Meretz Party lawmaker Ran Cohen said Netanyahu should resign.

The Sunday Times of London said Netanyahu, furious over the Hamas attacks in Jerusalem, had overruled his own Mossad intelligence agency to order Mashaal's assassination. Opponents reportedly argued that the action would jeopardize Israel's relations with Jordan and Mossad's operations there.

development in the south.

"In the 18th century, India was the top commercial manufacturer in the world, but India was subjected to compulsory liberalization," Chomsky said. "But in England, there was protection throughout the 17th and 18th centuries."

Chomsky's clearest example of the situation was the textile industry. In order to stop the import of Indian textiles, England imposed a 75 percent tariff and then barred Indian textiles completely. English textile then flooded India. Eventually, India had no cotton exports at all. According to Chomsky, this textiles pattern used by England is still used today, as the U.S. undertook the same policies.

"The U.S. has been a leader in protectionism in textiles, steel and energy," Chomsky said.

"The Reaganites lead the sustained assault on free trade principles," he said. "The restrictive efforts of the Reaganites are three times those of other countries.

"But there is nothing hidden, the problem remains that nobody studies what's going on," he continued.

In an abrupt conclusion, Chomsky said, "Today's struggles are very similar to the past but on a higher plain. We must continue the cause of freedom and justice, which Eqbal has been such an advocate, in his words and actions."

Chomsky then embraced Ahmad while he received a standing ovation.

cultures work. Far from being an arbitrator, he is a partisan advocate for one civilization over all others."

Said went on to say that Huntington's thinking results from the colonial heritage of the 20th century and the notion that each race has its own destiny, and asked, "Is this the best way to understand the world we live in? Is this a wise way to look at it?"

Said further criticized Huntington's thesis by arguing that it is impossible to define cultures narrowly, as they are constantly changing and redefining themselves.

"Statements about our culture require definitions," Said said. "Our time is a clash of definitions. There is no good definition of what Western civilization is. Defining the culture is always a major and ongoing contest."

Said claimed that it is just as important to study the dissenting groups in any culture, those that are fighting for a different definition than the mainstream.

"No culture is understandable with out this counter–culture," Said said. "To disregard this sense of relentless change is to miss what is vital and fertile in culture."

Furthermore, Said argued, Huntington's narrow interpretation of history and of current relations between cultures misses the interdependency of cultures.

"He obliterates the great and often silent dialogue between cultures and ignores the lifelong dedication of scholars, artists and others to try to come to terms with the other which seems so different," Said said. "The true weakest part of the thesis is the rigid separation imposed on cultures."

Rather than attempting to maintain U.S. hegemony, the goal of U.S. foreign policy should be to look at dangers from a "human" point of view, Said said.

"It does seem to me ostrich–like for the West to hold everyone else in bay in order to prolong our dominance," Said said. "It would be much more productive to adopt a new global mentality that sees dangers from a human point of view."

Said pointed towards the environmental and women's movements as examples of success in international efforts, which contribute to dissolution of cultural barriers and pride.

In conclusion, Said said Huntington's view of world politics as a "primitive stage of narcissistic struggle" is "exactly what we don't need now."

Question period

After his lecture, Said answered several questions from the audience which addressed methods for achieving a global viewpoint and resolution of the Israeli/Palestinian conflict.

The first step in reaching a global viewpoint, Said said, is to recognize human commonalities and to denationalize education.

"In the wake of the Cold War there is seen a need for new enemies," Said said. "The way to combat this view is to reveal it for what it is and to debate it. Through education, we can understand how powerful the effect of U.S. intervention is on the rest of the world."

In response to a question on the Israeli/Palestinian conflict, Said said that the U.S. citizenry plays a crucial role in the conflict, and argued that peace will not be achieved unless Israel recognizes the loss of the Palestinians in the creation of the Israeli state.

"The crises is a crises of conscious," Said said. "Until Israelis acknowledge what Israel cost the Palestinians, there will never be peace."

Said's two hour lecture was part of a weekend of speeches, entitled "Border Crossings", in honor of Eqbal Ahmad, who is retiring from Hampshire College after 15 years as a professor of politics and Middle East studies.

Raising awareness focus of Race Talks

By Justin Rosen
Collegian Correspondent

Race Talks, a collective of students interested in raising awareness of issues of racism and opening discussion in the University of Massachusetts community, is preparing another semester of activities and discussion on campus.

Race Talks was formed three years ago by a group of interested undergraduates with the assistance of Grant Ingle, Director of the Office of Human Relations, Sara Lennox, Director of the Social Thought and Political Economy Program and Ricardo Townes, Vice Chancellor of Campus Activities.

Race Talks has organized community forums around issues such as the Million Man March, Black Women and Feminism, and African–American and Jewish Relations. Professors and other speakers from this campus and elsewhere participated in these panel discussions which were presented for the UMass community.

Race Talks has also been responsible for presenting films about racism and facilitating discussions afterward. Last spring Race Talks and the B'Hai community presented the film Skin Deep and facilitated the discussion afterward. Over 50 people attended the film and discussion which was held on a Friday night.

Race Talks has also worked in coalition with other campus groups and organizations to call attention to racially discriminatory practices.

This semester Race Talks plans to continue raising awareness, educating and allowing a unrestrictive environment for discussion. Additionally Race Talks will place education and issues of racism into political action.

Race Talks' immediate plans include presenting a film and holding a discussion next Monday with Boricuos Unidos, a UMass resident student organization, with the time and place to be announced.

Race Talks which boasted 12 active members last semester is looking to recruit and involve more members of the UMass community this semester. Race Talks needs new people to help in all levels of organizing. There is a general planning meeting tonight in the Cape Cod Lounge at 6:30 p.m.

Linda Vannoni, a Race Talks member, said, "If you are interested in working with energetic and committed people come on down, your ideas and talents are important to us."

For more information about Race Talks, students can contact Linda Vannoni at 527–0247 or Nikki Morse at 587– 9759.

Sixteen children killed in schoolbus ambush

By Rachid Khiari
Associated Press

ALGIERS, Algeria — Armed men attacked a school bus yesterday in a region hard-hit by Algeria's Islamic insurgents, killing 16 schoolchildren and their driver, hospital sources said.

The bus crashed, rolling onto its side, when the driver apparently tried to run a roadblock set up by the attackers, according to the hospital sources, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

Some of the children died from gunshots to the head, the sources said.

The attack took place in Bouinan, near Blida, about 30 miles south of Algiers. The garrison town is in the heart of a region targeted by the Armed Islamic Group, a militant organization suspected in repeated, ruthless guerrilla massacres of civilians. On Friday, a rocket barrage on Blida killed 10 people and injured 20, the latest bloodshed in a nearly 6-year-old conflict between Islamic insurgents and Algerian security forces, which has killed an estimated 75,000 people.

The rockets were reportedly fired from the nearby Chrea mountains, used as a base for attacks on the isolated villages of the Mitidja Plain.

An army offensive on a stronghold of the Armed Islamic Group moved into its 11th day yesterday, with tanks and bulldozers advancing and helicopters circling a village that a general said guerrillas had mined and webbed with escape tunnels.

Several Algerian journalists allowed access to Oued Allel, 12 miles south of the capital, said security forces were closing in and appeared to be readying for an assault.

The Armed Islamic Group reportedly took over Oued Allel in 1994 after most of the village's 12,000 inhabitants fled.

"You de-mine a villa, you take risks and as soon as you get there, they have already moved on to another place," the commander in charge of the operation, identified only as Gen. Fodhil, said in an unprecedented briefing for reporters on the scene.

The account was carried by the pro-government paper El-Mudjahid and the independent daily El Watan. It was the first time since the start of the conflict that a top military official has spoken with the press.

"The terrorists have enough food and munitions to last a long time," the general was quoted as saying.

Across Algeria on Thursday and Friday, militants killed at least 105 people, including dozens of children, in a spree of massacres and bombings, targeting even a wedding.

U.N. building in Baghdad attacked

By Waiel Faleh
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Gunmen hurled grenades and fired bullets at a United Nations building in Baghdad, destroying one vehicle and damaging two others, officials said yesterday. One attacker was injured.

The wounded gunman was overpowered and taken into custody by the Iraqi army, said U.N. spokesman Eric Falt. The remaining three gunmen fled, he said.

The Saturday night assault targeted the World Health Organization's headquarters, which houses an office for U.N. officials monitoring the oil-for-food program.

No one claimed responsibility, but Iraq blamed it on Iran. The two neighbors fought a war from 1980 to 1988 and still are bitter enemies.

The official Iraqi News Agency said interrogation of the arrested person revealed that he and the others were sent by Iran's intelligence service. It did not provide a possible motive for the attack.

The news agency said the arrested attacker was an Iraqi of Iranian origin who was deported in 1985. It said he later entered the Iraqi territory to serve the Iranian intelligence's purposes." Details of the gunman's injuries were not known.

Since 1970, Iraq has deported tens of thousands of Iraqis of Iranian origin to Iran. Iraq said their loyalty to the country was suspect.

According to preliminary reports, the four men lobbed grenades and opened fire at the WHO building, the U.N. statement said. U.N. spokesman Falt told The Associated Press the attack took place after the office had closed and when only guards were at the building.

The carport roof was partially burned, Falt said. One four-wheel drive vehicle was destroyed and two others were severely damaged, he said.

U.N. humanitarian coordinator in Baghdad, Denis Halliday, condemned the attack, the first ever at a U.N. building in Iraq, the statement said.

"It is the Iraqi government's responsibility to protect U.N. personnel and property against any harm and Mr. Halliday has asked for an urgent meeting at the highest levels with the Iraqi leaders in order to express his concern," said the statement.

Shopping for clothes

Albertina Fernandes

Well, I'm pretty sure that you've probably read millions of unfortunate incidences concerning minorities, but rather than sit here to whine and moan about unfair practices in the town of Amherst, I'd rather you think about it as a comedy piece that is funny because you have no choice but to laugh hysterically. First things first.

I have been contemplating whether or not to write about that particular unfortunate incident that occurred to a poor little island girl, the treatment that us tanned skinned or sometimes dark individuals receive from those street vendors of Amherst center. I call them street vendors because they act as if though they have no manners.

The scenario begins with the poor little island girl not being too happy with this particular women's clothing store in Amherst. The only one that sells up-to-date fashions. The only one with snotty salespersons. Oh yeah, that one. How could I forget?

We all can relate to walking into a store and feeling as if the music has stopped or all of a sudden everyone is going on break — or, this is my favorite one, the salespeople say "We don't carry those items here." Well, I finally got my day in court so to speak.

Last April, my friend, boyfriend and I were frantically shopping for a last minute dress for a function later on that night. I guess we just didn't look like we could possibly carry any money because no salesperson or shoeperson (or whatever the hell they call those people) was available. They probably were incognito. I kept looking around hoping to see something that was me, but still no "May I help you?"

Still, it didn't dawn on me that I was being ignored by these archaic vultures. Usually they surround their prey before pouncing on them, but I guess I didn't have enough flesh to look appealing. One thing I did keep getting was these piercing stares as if I had disturbed their sleep or something. Well anyway, I finally saw something that caught the gleam in my eyes. I walked over and took the dress off the rack and asked a salesperson to let me into the fitting rooms. Like a robot, she opened the doors and disappeared again like dust on a windy day.

Meanwhile my friend and the guy whose last part of his name begins with friend, were browsing the store looking for an alternate dress in case I didn't like the way that one fit. I decided that the dress that I had chosen was perfect for the occasion. The dress was only say $135. I walked over to the cash register to purchase the dress, took out money from my decrepit purse.

What do you know? I had two one-hundred dollar bills in there. Wow. How did those get in there?

Silly me, my father gave that to me as a coming-home gift. The instant those salespeople got a load of the Benjamins, all of a sudden the lights came on — it was like a disco.

They surrounded me as if I were John Travolta. They were suggesting matching earrings, they even fetched me matching shoes. The whole nine yards. It was lovely. I was basking in the attention. I stood there wondering if they knew how ridiculously foolish they looked.

I knew that if this had not been a last minute decision, I would have received better service from RAVE in the Holyoke Mall (and they're not even on commission.)

Well, suffice to say they will not be receiving my patronage ever again. It will be difficult since they are the closest thing if you don't own a car. I will hold my ground firmly. I will dissuade my friends, even foes from the treatment that I had to endure. As Voy Fernandes says, "To have or not to have" Is the question here. In that case I can do without.

Albertina Fernandes is a UMass student.

Embarrassed

Jamie Haslam

I was fortunate enough to witness the round table discussion entitled "In Pursuit of Justice: Women's Equality and the Public Good" on Sept. 13 in Sage Hall, Smith College. The event was in honor of Ruth Bader Ginsburg, the Associate Justice of the Supreme Court who had just received the first Sophia Smith Award the day before.

The standing-room only crowd indicated in itself the importance of the event. The participants included Representative Jane Lakes Harmon (D-California), attorney Catharine MacKinnon, author and editor Gloria Steinem, and Nina Totenberg, a correspondent for National Public Radio and ABC.

The group told of the barriers women confront in their quests for accomplishment in this country. They spoke of the frustrations they all had experienced — incidents where because of their gender alone, opportunities were taken from them.

Stephanie Kulp Seymor, a chief judge of the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals, reported that when she was nominated for her position the main objection was whether she could handle her work duties while being a mother of four. However, the other top candidate was a father of five.

The women spoke quite frankly about overcoming these obstacles in reaching their peaks of success. They gave tremendous motivation and encouragement to the numerous Smith students intently watching. The theme they presented, "Get out there and do it!" had impact because these women are doing it. They have fought for ideas they truly believe in, and are continuing the battle.

They spoke of the need for women to unify and help each other up the ladder. They spoke of reuniting the fight for women's rights with the fight for racial rights, as in the past.

I was proud for all Smith students, proud of women. I was proud, most of all, of those women speaking who had led lives of such profound significance.

The trouble is that I am a white man. As a white man, I took the role of sympathizer. I was graciously labeled as an "enlightened man" by Rep. Harmon, who recognized the males in attendance amongst her "sisters."

As I heard the advice from these wise women to their younger "sisters," I felt rightfully left out. I watched. But what was I to act on? I cannot fight for my own equality and fair treatment, because I have already been treated over-fairly.

Being a white male for me is not full of pride. How could it be? In light of the injustices white men have stricken this and many other countries with, it is almost embarrassing. Walking home from this event, I reflected on a time when I was quite full of self-satisfaction for being an American male.

In my early school years I was quickly taught that I belonged to the "Land of the Free." I was told stories of wonderful beginnings of a nation, this great fellow Christopher Columbus, how we thanked Native Americans upon our arrival for their gifts of food and hospitality.

Since those early years, I have learned about the cruelties our nation has committed during its young life. I discovered that we thanked the Native Americans by slaughtering them and driving them away. I discovered that in my country, a country that has promoted its beginnings as based on the equality of all, only white male landowners could vote.

I learned that the "Land of the Free" really means "The Land where White Men are Free."

How can I fight for equality when I myself stand on the high end of an unequal balance? My role can only be of a sympathizer. That is what it must be, for all I can do is sympathize for people oppressed by white men.

I sympathize for these people because I, like them, cannot understand how gender and race can effectively determine one's opportunities (and thus happiness and life.) I can only hope that by treating women as equal and not determining their worth on physical criteria, I can help their causes succeed.

I also stand embarrassed. Embarrassed to belong to an educated "First World" country that has been run by selfish and ridiculous white supremacy — which should not take a minute of education to appear as conceited cruelty and absolute idiocy.

Supports Honors College

To the Editor:

I was appalled to see "Honors College" and "Proposition 209" in the same sentence (Sept. 30). Saying that an Honors College "goes against the mission of public higher learning and institutes inequality" is blatantly incorrect.

First of all, the Honors Program exists already, with separate living and educational facilities, as well as life-after-UMass working and writing for newspapers and magazines. Now I'm one of the advisers of The Current, the newspaper of ConVal High School in Peterborough, N.H.

I want to congratulate you on your very fine online production (http://www.umass.edu/rso/collegian). It is beyond the wildest dreams of those of us from the sixties. It's also a goal that high schoolers can aspire to. Best wishes to all concerned!

Resist more than just Cassini

To the Editor:

Ted Hudgens' letter to the editor (Sept. 24) stated that I was misinformed about the possible serious consequences of the launch of the Cassini space probe. Hudgens thinks that even if the spacecraft was to blow up on the launch pad or if there was a fly-by accident, "The canisters containing the Pu-238 are designed to withstand re-entry and extreme impacts." Journalist Karl Grossman will be speaking at UMass on the topic of Cassini Oct. 7 at the Student Union Ballroom at 7 p.m. He will be able to explain why Cassini is unsafe to launch.

As for the nuclearization of space by NASA, I guess that Mr. Hudgens is unaware of NASA's secret military missions. The Clinton Administration never put an end to the Strategic Defense Initiative of the Reagan/Bush era. Instead, they changed the name to the Ballistic Missile Defense and continue to give it an annual budget of billions of dollars.

The future of the heavens is a nuclear nightmare. An aerospace industry alliance of seven companies has come up with a plan to build nuclear-powered communications satellites. NASA is also moving ahead with plans to build a nuclear-powered space colony on the moon. And, of course, they want to construct nuclear-power battle stations to be able to shoot laser weapons to wipe out any "terrorist" on Earth who might threaten the power base of the global corporations who rule the world.

Using outer space spy satellites which can peer into one's bedroom, they will be able to locate any dissenting voice and eliminate it from their universe. We are on the verge of a global totalitarianism like the world has never seen before. We must find a way to stop the nuclear regime before the few crazy people who control politics, military and the media use 21st century technology to make us all into their slaves.

The way deadly plutonium is being put into our world, it makes me wonder if the people who are in charge are some kind of monstrous aliens masquerading as humans who really live and breathe plutonium. Perhaps their plan is to make Earth habitable for their plutonium breathing species because these nuclear-power projects are definitely not in the interested of the future of humanity!

The enforcement of the UMass Picketing Code is part of this nuclear power regime. We must find a way to gather the masses together and start a student uprising for the goals to rejuvenating the Earth, using solar power and the ethics of people over profits to fuel our vision of a planet of ecovillages and ecocities living together in cosmic peace.

Congratulations!

To the Editor:

I was a student at UMass when the Collegian became The Massachusetts Daily Collegian. Although I was never a Collegian staffer, I loved the paper and have spent much of my life from the mother who raised her to the men who educated and (mis-educated) her about love. Each experience Sister Souljah shares bares a controversial truth about the black condition in America: the disintegration of families, as well as the various ways in which racism continues to circumscribe the way African- American people treat one another.

At the conclusion of the book, Sister Souljah imparts her final words of wisdom in a chapter entitled Listen Up (Straighten it out) in which she addresses the root problems of racism and of the problems between African-American men and women. The question of problems between men and women and the quest for answers is the central issue of the book.

Sister Souljah says, "The question is easy to ask. The answer is hard to find. But the search is essential. Too many of us are in pain; too many of us are lonely. Sex is everywhere, while true love falls victim to the turmoil of our fight merely to survive."

Preceding the issues of race and relationships, Sister Souljah provides her readers with some rules to live by.

"It is important for all children to have two parents, a father and a mother. The absence of either will affect the child. The consequences may not be apparent for many years. Perhaps not until that child attempts to have a relationship of his or her own.

"It's important for women to have a healthy definition of themselves. You should not look to the men you meet, or to your girlfriends for your sense of self, your self-esteem, your role as women. You should cultivate your mind, spirit, body, heart and soul. Doing so will make you more attractive and increase your intelligence. Hard work will be rewarded, often times in ways that can't be foreseen early on. Be compassionate and loving. Keep your mind balanced. A man may love your sex, but he will probably not love you, respect your mind or your spirit, heart and soul.

"Believe in God. Many people blame God for the conditions we find ourselves in. Or we blame the racist system which we live under, and we are not entirely wrong to do so. God gave us our minds with which to think. Remember; no one will save us but ourselves. Neither God nor white people will do so.

"First we must learn to respect ourselves. That is the test we must pass, the promise we must make to each other, the challenge of all of our lives."

Eloquent , articulate and forthright, Sister Souljah is a solid thinker. The result is an outspoken and outrageous rejoinder to the pieties of race, class and gender by a writer who can be wise, brutally funny and as sensitive as a lightning rod in a thunderstorm.

Terry: the first, unfamiliar poetess

By Louis Phillippe S. Sterlin
Collegian Correspondent

Canon formation: The creation of oral or written chronicles.

The development of African-American canon literary began early in colonial America. Men from the New World abducted thousands of Africans from their homeland, and brought them on ships to function as slaves.

The slaves were coerced into dismissing their own languages and cultures, and smote to accept the culture of the New World. The language they unwillingly learned was English, and with it they learned to communicate their regular affairs, but also to manifest a spacious array of feelings and remembrances in tales and songs recognized today as American folklore.

The folklore created by plantation slaves was first retained in the oral tradition and later became a powerful source of works, both respectable and original, for literary material.

Being a slave meant that the freedom to live as you pleased was denied forcibly. The 360-degree transition from Africa to America was difficult, because the education which the masters were demanding was lacking. The majority were against slaves receiving an education, because the masters feared that the educated would lead to a revolt. Receiving education was hard. In the South, the law denied blacks (free or enslaved) to receive an education. And in the North, the availability of schooling for African Americans was limited, even after 1830, when most slaves had been freed.

Though the majority was against them, some blacks challenged the odds in order to express their stories, a fact attested to by a large body of slave narratives, or autobiographical accounts of hardships and tortures of slavery. The writings of Briton Hammon, Jupiter Hammon, who was the first black to have a literary piece published, displayed great perseverance and resolution of antebellum blacks who demonstrated their humanity and intelligence to a mainstream Caucasian society that, by and large, denied to acknowledge either. If literate slaves didn't write their narratives, which created the canon for African American literature, then the grace and beauty they embodied would never have added such diversity and strength to American folklore.

The woman who started the literary revolution was Lucy Terry Prince. Born in West Africa in 1730, Terry was kidnapped as an infant, and brought to the New World as a slave in waiting. In 1746, Terry wrote "Bars Fight" at the age of 16. The poem concentrates and reflects upon King Georges War which happened in Deerfield. Her poem is comedic because of the technique she chose, the ancient language, the clumsy alliterations and its unsophisticated proximity of ideas.

BARS FIGHT

August, 'twas the twenty-fifth,
Seventeen hundred forty-six,
The Indian did ambush lay,
Some very valient men to slay.

Samuel Allen like a hero fought,
And though he was so brave and bold,
His face no more shall we behold.

Eleazer Hawks was killed outright,
Before he had time to fight,
Before he did the Indians see,
Was shot and killed immediately.

Oliver Amsden he was slain,
Which caused his friends much grief and pain
Simeon Amsden they found dead
Not many rods distant from his head.

Adonijah Gillet, we do here,
Did loose his life which was so dear.
John Sadler fled across the water,
And thus caped the dreadful slaughter.

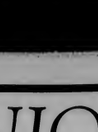
Eunice Allen see [sic] the Indians coming,
And hoes to save herself by running;
And not her petticoats stopped her,
The awful creatures had catched [sic] her.

Nor tommy hawked her on the head.
Young Samuel Allen, Oh lack-a-day!
Was takne and carried to Canada.

The reason I chose Ms. Terry to commemorate African American writers, was because her poem wasn't published until the late 1800s. Lucy Terry was the first African to contribute to American literature. She strived to enrich undeveloped minds and plant fresh ideas, but never got the chance to see her works published.

Those who know

Knowledge is a many splendid thing. It never ceases to amaze me how much one can do when they put their mind to it. Lately, there's been a huge swing of brothas and sistas picking up the mantle of intellectualism and claiming knowledge, wisdom and understanding as their key to life.



Not surprisingly, those who really know are making incredible strides for themselves and their people. These are the folks who have taken it upon themselves to get involved in the various resident student organizations (RSOs) and clubs on campus. These are the cats who are putting in mad hours down at WMUA Radio and your University of Massachusetts Daily Collegian (shameless plug, I know).

Those who know are claiming knowledge, wisdom, understanding and are actually applying it in their daily walk, but there are a significant number of those who aren't. For one reason or another, some brothas and sistas feel the need to claim knowledge, but when it comes to getting things done and puttin' down for the community, all they seem to do is blow smoke. These are the people that are in need of a self-check.

It doesn't take much to be able to recycle dates and names. There was a time when I use to think that because I could recite the Black Panther's Ten Point Program, I was someone who was "in there." I read all the usuals (Roots, Black Power Ideologies, Brotherman and other various Civil Rights and black power books) and no one could tell me anything about black issues. I listened to the speeches, the lectures and bought the Final Call every time I saw a brother in suit and bow tie.

If you spoke to me, be ready to get a sermon, because I was a steaming hot-bed of aggression, knowledge and intellectual piss and vinegar, but I wasn't involved in jack- squat. I was the kind of person that could give you 10,001 reasons why black people are in the political, economic and mental hell that we reside, but wouldn't give one reason how to get out. Sound like anyone you know?

Let it be clear that I'm not saying you shouldn't get all the knowledge you can. That's ridiculous (if you haven't read any of the books I mentioned above, I highly recommend them), but what I am trying to say is that just reading the book doesn't make you a revolutionary.

Humphrey brown III

There are way too many truly intellectual brothas and sistas out there who know plenty, but don't use their mental powers for good. Instead, they fall prey to the evil, maniacal Dr. Gripe-a-lot and his evil minions, bitch-and-moan.

What good is knowledge if all you do is complain and give off the impression that you're down and black, when in reality, the limits of your pro-activity don't go beyond a call-in to BET Talk Live?

True knowledge and wisdom lies not only in the reading of the books, but in practice outside of your comfort zone.

There were crazy cats back in the day, who wrote the very books we receive our information from, that knew their stuff. The difference between them and many of us, is that they applied what they knew to help bring the mental levels of their communities to a new plateau. They didn't sit around and complain about the struggle. They were a part of the struggle.

No one is saying you have to start laying down in front of moving police cars or take over administration buildings (if you really feel the need to hit Whitmore, I'd understand). All I'm asking, all your black community is asking, is that if you have the knowledge, spread the power. It's that simple.

Those who know realize that they're playing themselves if they settle for just knowin' names and dates. These days, particularly as UMass-ter is taking all our money, it's imperative that you put some of that sweet information to good use. Otherwise, you might as well not know anything at all.

One person who knows nothing, but is willing to put it down for his black community, is more valuable than 20 heads who know the history of the Civil Rights Movement, but don't do anything.

Everyone is needed in the battle for equality, but if all our leaders are too busy feeding their egos, when are we ever going to win? I can count on my fingers and toes, the number of brothas and sistas who are making the kind of moves needed on this campus. They're the heads of our ALANA RSOs and the ones you call when you want to know what's happening with the Goodell student-administrator meetings or any other issues pertaining to this community. They're going round for round with the SGA and making sure you're rights don't get stripped away right up from under your nose. To those warriors, I give my utmost respect and admiration.

Students, administrators and professors who really know, are doing what they can for the advancement of this black nation. What do you know about it?

Beats, Lyrics and Conscious Knowledge

Commercial hip hop. The first name I associate with this phrase is Sean "Puffy" Combs a.k.a. Puff Daddy. Before I start breaking the science of his steady commercialization, let me define for you what my man Mr. Webster defines as commercial. Commercial is: of relating to, or engaged in commerce, designed for profit.

Marketed to club scenes and commercial media, Puffy has monopolized control over a large part of the voice of hip hop, rap and R&B. By packaging music to cater to certain audiences, he has designed his music for profit and is thereby becoming a commercial entity.

Don't get me wrong, I am not one of those so called "playa hatas" that Puffy constantly reminds us of in his music. I give much respect where respect is due, but Puffy as a businessman and an enctertainer, not as an artist.

> "I don't know what they want from me, seems like the more money we come across, the more problems we see."
> — Puffy/Mace "Mo money, Mo problems"

You may ask what an artist is. Hip hop is a culture in which rap, R&B and reggae, among other forms of music, is the voice that expresses the art. The definition of art and artists is highly subjective, being that taste is highly subjective, but an artist to me understands their art and assumes the responsibility of the art they create; someone who uses their imagination to express themselves creatively. An artist is original, with intellect of innovation. An artist is usually selfless and lives to create their art as an expression of self. Puffy is none of the above.

Suki Seetharaman

His lyrical prose and content is monotonous. He lacks originality, conscious knowledge and innovation. His objective is not to express himself in a creative manner, but to design and package a product for capital gain. His love of banking on this capitalistic success influences his style and his expression more than his love for the art form. This is reflected in his music, through the innumerable number of songs that speak of the amount of money he makes, the kinds of pricey cars he drives and the so called "chicken heads" that surround him.

Puffy is a capitalist in the true essence of the word. The nature of his expression and his music is very capitalist. Seems like the only goal in his life is to get paid, and get paid by any means necessary. That means doing whatever I have to do to get where I'm going, stabbing whomever in the back to get mines. Amidst all of this, Puffy has forgotten one of the most important characteristics of an artist and has failed to assume the responsibility of the power that he holds: the power of voice. The voice of hip hop holds power over millions of young black men and women who strive to be like those who hold the controls; the artists, the entertainers, the producers, the promoters.

The influence of this voice is evident and the influence of Puffy is only too visible. I peep the Lil Kim, Mary J. Blije lookalikes, with their Chanel and Moschino attire, the Biggie wannabes with their cutthroat "I don't care, I'm a get mine" attitudes, and of course the "Big Willie" wannabes who use their clothes, gold, cars and money to attract their "chickens." This is all the reflection of the influence that Puffy seems to forget about.

The capitalism that has Puffy living large (as some may see it), is the same capitalism that, due to its cutthroat competitive nature, has taken the lives of two of its most renowned artists, Tupac Shakur and Biggie Smalls. It is the same capitalism that has us, as a black people, digressing from social and political awareness into its clutches of cutthroat competition, individualism and lethargy of revolution.

This capitalistic attitude that Puffy advocates (money is everything) is very influential in dividing us as a black people to do whatever it takes and stab whomever in the back to make it. We have been striving to get away from falling into the game of divide and conquer to progress. Using art as an expression and a voice is one of the most prominent ways of achieving this success. The authority of this voice, in the art form, can be used to express a variety of different ways of life. Money is definitely one of those things, but as Puffy doesn't realize, it isn't everything.

Black like me: Cape Verdean

First of all, for those who do not know, Cape Verde is an archipelago off the west coast of Africa. The country is only 22 years old and is a former Portuguese colony.

My quest for the answer "Are Cape Verdeans Black?" actually began when I went back home to Brockton last weekend. Something funny happened. As I was at a gas station gassing up my Lexus LS 450 (I wish), I was confronted by an old playground buddy. He asked me what I was up to and we spoke for a while. When I was about to leave though, he asked me a funny question. He asked me if I was black. He knew that I was Cape Verdean, but he was wondering whether or not Cape Verdeans are black.

I said to him that I was black, but kept thinking about the question the whole ride back to Amherst. Had I misrepresented my Cape Verdean brothers and sisters? Did they consider themselves black? So, I went on and devised a quick, four-question poll in order to get the opinion of Cape Verdeans on this campus. I can't say that I was really shocked by the results, because I did not know exactly what to expect.

The poll was conducted at a general body meeting of the Cape Verdean Student Alliance (CVSA). I surveyed 32 Cape Verdeans. What I found was that 84 percent of those polled considered themselves black, 9 percent did not consider themselves black, and 7 percent did not know. After reading these results, I went on to see if there were any correlations between the answer of, "No, I am not black," and Cape Verdeans of a lighter complexion. Eighty-six percent of the Cape Verdeans of a light skin complexion considered themselves black. Ironically, this percentage was higher than the percentage of brown-skinned Cape Verdeans who considered themselves black, which was 81 percent. All 100 percent of the dark-skinned Cape Verdeans considered themselves black.

These results help show us that being black is not dependant on the color of your skin, the width of your nose, the texture of your hair, having family or friends in jail, or any of the other predisposed ideas of what it means to be black.

When asked if they considered themselves African, 97 percent of the Cape Verdeans said, "yes."

The poll results showed that the majority of Cape Verdeans on this campus do consider themselves black, and that the majority of them also consider themselves African. Also, there does not seem to be any correlation between Cape Verdeans having a light complexion and not considering themselves black.

> "In the same way that African-American is an ethnic group, Haitian is an ethnic group, Italian is an ethnic group, Cape Verdean is an ethnic group."
> Edgar Barros

This poll satisfied my curiosity of where my fellow Cape Verdeans stood on the issue, but the results exposed some uncertainties about the poll itself. Are these results related to the fact that the Cape Verdeans who were polled are college students? If I conducted this same poll in a regular community setting, would the results turn out similar? Furthermore, were these results the affect of not polling a big enough sample of Cape Verdeans? Any one of these unknowns could have played a key factor in the results. Therefore, I realize that the results of my poll cannot be officially stamped as the global view amongst Cape Verdeans, but it does give us some insight on where the Cape Verdeans stand on the issue.

In my opinion, there is no doubt in my mind that Cape Verdeans are black. Of course, I realize that just stating my opinion does not mean much to you. You probably want to know why.

What I like to do is point out the difference between the two identities in question — Cape Verdean and black. The fact is that they are not two separate ideas, rather one is a more specific description of the other. Cape Verdean is an ethnic group and black is a race, not the other way around. There is a black race, but there is no Cape Verdean race. In the same way that African-American is an ethnic group, Haitian is an ethnic group, Italian is an ethnic group, Cape Verdean is an ethnic group. I looked up the two terms, "ethnic group" and "race" in Big Blue. (Big Blue is the nickname for my Webster's New Universal Unabridged Dictionary. This is what it said: ethnic group — a group of people of the same race or nationality who share a common and distinctive culture; race — a group a persons related by common descent, blood, or heredity.

This is interesting because it lets us realize that Cape Verdeans are a sub-group of the black race. All black people are "related by common descent, blood, or heredity." All black people, all over the world, are of African origin. We cannot allow differences in language, culture and skin complexion divide our race. That is how we got beat in the first place. Do you know anything about the strategy of divide and conquer? When we divide our race, we make ourselves an easy target to conquer and control. Be safe.

No Disrespect
Sister Souljah
Vintage Books

"I never said I was an angel. Nor am I innocent or holy like the Virgin Mary. What I am is natural and serious and as sensitive as an open nerve on an ice cube. I'm a young black sister with an unselfish heart who overdosed on love long ago. My closest friends consider me soft-spoken. Others say I have a deadly tongue. And while it's true that I have a spicy attitude like most of the ghetto girls I know, I back it up with a quick, precise and knowledgeable mind. My memory runs way back and I'm inclined to remind people of the things they'd most like to forget."

Rapper, activist, and hip-hop rebel, Sister Souljah possesses a passionate voice to deliver a survival manual for any African-American woman who wants to keep her heart open and integrity intact. In this stunning autobiography she sets the record straight on where she stands in life, love, spirituality and race.

The good & the bad about soaps

Soap Chat
with Jacob Fanning

Well, as usual, I have some bad news and some good news regarding the daytime industry. Let's start with the bad!

In what is clearly another case of an actor's ego getting the best of him, Robert Kelker-Kelly (Shane on "Another World") wants out of his contract. Sources behind the scenes say that he has been unhappy with the direction that head writer Michael Malone has taken the character since his arrival. I remember hearing this guy whine about how unhappy he was at "Days of Our Lives" during his stint as Bo. In my opinion, he should be happy he even has a job! There's been conflicting news as to whether "AW" has released him from the contract, so I'll keep you posted. I may have a lot more to say about this disturbing news in the next few weeks. As for the good news...

ABC has confirmed that Kimberly McCullogh (Robin on "General Hospital") is returning to the soap full time. I know you're thinking, "What about her enrollment at New York University where she had been taking classes which was the reason for leaving the show in the first place?" Word is she has withdrawn from the university indefinitely and is moving back to California. Those of you who saw her performance during Robin and Jason's break-up know what an asset she is to the show. She was absolutely riveting. What will this mean for Robin's future with Jason? Stay tuned. Welcome back, Kimberly, we've missed you.

On the "Days" front, looks like Eileen Davidson (Kristin, Susan and Sister Moria) has signed for three more months. Can't wait to see her raise some more hell (not to mention rip out Marlena's hair). Look for her to add a fourth character to the mix. Rumor has it, it may be a man! Ah, never a dull moment on "Days." If only they could bring back the devil.

Now, to the matter at hand. I was reading Soap Opera Update last week and already they're buzzing about next year's daytime Emmy nominations (the telecast airs in late May). The mere mention of the event got my adrenaline pumping and I thought to myself, "Why not have our own little award shindig, University of Massachusetts style?" I mean, who better than us, the fans, to decide on who is the most deserving of such praise. The outcome of last year's daytime Emmy award show was so disappointing that I thought we'd fill in for this year's event. With this said, I'm asking you, the fans, to cast your votes (via e-mail) on Best Actor, etc. I'd really appreciate the feedback! I, along with three of my friends (fans of various soaps) — Dave Giampa, Gina DeFelice and Jeremy Sala, have come up with the following categories and nominations:

- Best Actor: Maurice Bernard (Sonny, "GH"), Roger Howarth (Todd, "One Life To Live"), John Callahan (Edmund, "All My Children"), Steve Burton (Jason, "GH"), Ian Buchanan (James, "Bold and the Beautiful").
- Best Actress: Eileen Davidson (Kristin/Susan/Sister Moria, "Days"), Cynthia Waltros (Annie, "Guiding Light"), Susan Lucci (Erica, "AMC"), Nancy Lee Grahn (Alexis, "GH"), Gina Tognoni (Kelly, "OLTL").
- Best Vixen: Sarah Buxton (Annie, "Sunset Beach"), Sarah Brown (Carly, "GH"), Eileen Davidson (Kristin, "Days"), Cynthia Waltros (Annie, "GL"), Sandra Nelson (Phyllis, "Young and the Restless").
- Best Newcomer: Eddie Cibrian (Cole, "Sunset Beach"), Lisa Peluso (Lila, "AW"), Rhonda Ross (Toni, "AW"), Becky Hearst (Lizzie, "GH"), and Florenzo (Tea, "OLTL").
- Hottest Male: Tyler Christopher (Nikolas, "GH"), Eddie Cibrian (Cole, "SB"), Steve Burton (Jason, "GH"), Drake Hogestyn (John, "Days"), Mark Consuelos (Mateo, "AMC").
- Hottest Female: Vanessa Marcil (Brenda, "GH"), Kristin Alfonso (Hope, "Days"), Lynn Herring (Lucy, "Port Chester"), Eva LaRue Callahan (Maria, "AMC"), Lisa Peluso (Lila, "AW").
- Greatest couple that never was (this year): John and Hope ("Days"), Mike and Carrie ("Days"), Lily and Damien ("As the World Turns"), A.J. and Carly ("GH") and Lila and Shane ("AW").
- Drama Queen: Deirdre Hall (Marlena, "Days"), Jacklyn Zeeman (Bobbie, "GH"), Robin Strasser ("OLTL"), Jennifer Bassey (Marian, "AMC") and Lynn Herring (Lucy, "PC").
- Hottest Couple: Brenda and Sonny ("GH"), Annie and Alan ("GL"), Karen and Joe ("PC"), Liza and Adam ("AMC"), John and Marlena ("Days").
- Best Storyline: Carly's deception ("GH"), Reva vs. Annie ("GL"), Kelly's car accident ("OLTL"), Erica stealing baby ("AMC"), Kristin and Marlena locked in cellar ("Days").
- Most Annoying Character (co-ed): Lucky ("GH"), Laura ("Days"), Tim ("AMC"), Ridge ("B&B"), Dmitri ("AMC")
- Best Show: "Another World," "Young and the Restless," "General Hospital," "All My Children," "Days of Our Lives"

We tried our best to be fair, but if we left someone out who you thought was just as, if not more, deserving, we apologize. Please e-mail your opinion to jfanning@student.umass.edu. I'll post the results in next week's column.

Benefit an evening of honest music

A CELEBRATION OF WOMEN'S VOICES BENEFIT CONCERT
First Church of Northampton
Oct. 4

NORTHAMPTON — As I sat in the First Church of Northampton, not really knowing what to expect, I scanned the small but substantial audience sitting in the rich wooden pews and I thought about why these people were here. A Celebration of Woman's Voices was a concert whose goal was to not only exhibit some of the purest voices in the area but also to benefit Necessities/Necesidades — an organization which aids emotionally, economically and physically battered women. The dimly lit church, with its high ceiling, stained glass windows, majestic pipe organ and awesome acoustics, set the scene for a showcase of artists supporting an excellent cause.

Lindsay Amore started the evening off. Accompanied by just her guitar, this mature 11-year-old captivated and amazed the audience with her talented and genuine voice. Amore, who has been playing for a little over two years, appeared relaxed in front of so many people and showed promise for a long career.

Blues artist Susan Gulielmetti followed, with the help of Joe Roderick on piano and sax and Peter Kim on bass. Although a little out of sync for their first song, they eventually smoothed out the creases and triumphantly created a bluesy, sometimes twangy, groove that could have been deemed appropriate for either a benefit in a church or the main lounge act at a bar.

Next up was Brenda Evans, whose strong voice and powerful lyrics skillfully achieved songs that ran straight to your heart, told you stories, and really made you think. And her mellow but confident attitude was a welcome addition to the night's activities.

Annie Wenz added a distinct flavor to the evening using not only her guitar but several traditional Native American instruments as well, such as a love flute to produce an intricate but well-balanced sound.

Continuing and adding to the diverse bill, Justina & Joyce used their contrasting but complementary voices, along with their guitars and a dulcimer, to achieve distinguishable and pleasant melodies. Finally, the benefit was capped off with Free at Last, a 6-piece band whose upbeat rhythms and tempos were an appropriate end to a fulfilling evening.

A Celebration of Women's Voices displayed individual artists and talents with unique sounds that all had one thing in common, people doing what they loved to do. There were no fancy amps or microphones involved, there were no major contracts or hefty pay checks to look forward to. It was simply musicians and volunteers offering their time to support a serious and well-deserved cause.

Dior created incredible fashion revolution

By Suzy Patterson
Associated Press

PARIS — On Feb. 12, 1947, an unknown couturier launched a fashion bombshell that turned into a revolution. The designer was Christian Dior, whose New Look was met with popular and professional postwar reactions of shock, thrill, horror, scandal, depending on the point of view.

The new dropped shoulders, wasp waists, padded hips and long, full skirts were feminine and opulent eye-openers. They put the international media to scribbling and American women on the march, incensed at the change exaggerated by the austerity of the war years.

But Dior prevailed. Other designers took up the longer lengths, and American teen-agers started looking like Gibson girls in skirts that brushed the tops of their bobby socks.

Amid the early public disdain were cheers from fashion insiders. Carmel Snow, editor of Harper's Bazaar, was thrilled and gave the style its name by declaring: "Christian, your dresses have such a new look."

The war years hadn't been easy for Americans, but they were particularly hard on European women. Silhouettes were masculine and skirts were short, due to a shortage of fabric.

"Clothes actually became quite hideous during the war," according to Simone Baron, a top fashion editor now retired.

"Almost a caricature of what they had been in the '30s when Schiaparelli and Chanel were tops."

Elsa Schiaparelli moved to New York during the war, but a staff stayed on for a while in her house on the Place Vendome. Many other couture houses continued with skeleton crews, Jacques Heim, Gres, Balenciaga and Nina Ricci among them.

At one point, the Germans tried to coerce Paris designers into moving their workshops to Germany. Lucien LeLong, head of the fashion guild, the Chambre Syndicale, would have none of it.

"No nation in the world has the power to expatriate the creative genius of Paris," he said. "Haute couture is in Paris or not at all."

As Paris emerged from war deprivation, the fashion world was ready for a radical change. The femininity, the sheer extravagance and novel silhouette offered by Dior was it.

Born in 1905 to a wealthy family in Normandy, Dior had always loved costumes, and as a young man he went to Paris, meeting artists, writers and musicians. He opened an art gallery that failed along with the family fortune, served in World War II and finally turned to dressmaking.

Dior worked first for Robert Piguet, then for LeLong. Ultimately he opened his own salon with financial backing from Marcel Boussac, a fabric magnate known as the "king of cotton."

The protege-couturier aimed for the highest quality. He chose his staff of 60 and the mansion that is still Dior's 40 years after his death.

Band highlights UNH–UMass game

By Corey Peter Goodman
Collegian Staff

It's Saturday morning, 7 a.m.

While the University of Massachusetts campus lay sound asleep in the shadows of Friday night, dozens of yellow busses packed with nearly 4,000 high school students, march into the dust-covered parking lot of Warren P. McGuirk Stadium.

They've come from 60 high schools all across New England, New York and Pennsylvania. Many of them have traveled throughout the night for the opportunity to perform with the top marching band in New England on Band Day.

"It's unbelievable, the effort on their part," said George Parks, director of the Minuteman marching band. "The whole day was spectacular."

Unfortunately for the more than 14,000 fans who came out Saturday to see both the Minuteman marching band and the UMass football team at their best, UMass came up on the short end against the New Hampshire Wildcats, 28–10.

Led by Parks, the Minuteman marching band helped the near-capacity crowd forget about the game with a scintillating sequence of performances at halftime and after the game.

Four thousand people took to the field during the halftime show including the color guard, baton twirlers, dancers, rifle team, sabre team and the extended band. Coordinated by a rainbow of uniform and flag colors, the band flowed and erupted in a final blast of drums and horns.

The 20-minute performance went without a hitch, a minor miracle according to Parks.

"It took a lot of faith," he said. "When you think it's an impossible task, you just have to keep plowing ahead."

The marching band was more than successful, as was evident by the thousands of fans who remained standing and cheering after the game while the band concluded the afternoon with a final performance.

"It was overwhelming," Parks said. "The crowd went crazy and everyone responded so well."

"It's an unbelievable feeling," said Anthony Fors, a junior drum major. "The high school kids are pumped to the max. And we feed off of it, and the crowd does too."

"We have a lot of great teams on this campus," he said. "The band is one of them. They really believe in who they are," he said. "They'll make any sacrifice they need to."

George Parks

Parks said the first Band Day was in 1985 and included just three schools. "We've come a long way," he said. "It's a rather big event."

According to Parks, Band Day's success over the years can be attributed to the improvement of the Minuteman marching band during the same time.

"We have a lot of great teams on this campus," he said. "The band is one of them. They really believe in who they are," he said. "They'll make any sacrifice they need to."

Band members set aside an hour and twenty minutes each day in order to practice and keep the program in a class of its own, Parks said.

He added that the band needs to bring in more than 100 new faces each year to keep the program rolling. He said one-third of the current band members were once high school participants in Band Day.

"Of course what we do during Band Day is also recruiting," he added. "So many great kids get to come to our campus. And we can bring the audience to us."

Hokies blow past Minutewomen 3–1

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Correspondent

Through the trials and tribulations of life as a volleyball player or coach, one realizes that each day has its own identity. Some days the team gels and has what it takes to win. On other days, things just don't click.

On Friday night, the Massachusetts volleyball team had to deal with the latter.

The Virginia Tech Hokies came into the Cage this weekend and routed the Minutewomen to the tune of a 15–12, 15–2, 12–15, 15–6 victory.

"It just came down to unforced errors. Normally, when you're neck and neck in kills, it's a tight match. But we had 13 more errors and that was the difference," UMass coach Bonnie Kenny said.

That was indeed the case as the Minutewomen (8–7, 4–2 in the conference) struggled to put together a consistent attack scheme. Jill Meyers led UMass with 19 kills, but as a team, the Minutewomen hit .146 and no individual was able to muster up a hitting percentage of .200.

The first game was tightly contested, as neither team's lead was ever more than five points. Virginia Tech took it, despite having six match points brushed off by the Minutewomen.

The Hokies rolled in game two as the errors started to pile up. With the score 2–1 early on, Tech ran off nine straight points, eventually taking a two-set lead.

Things got interesting in game three. UMass stormed out to a 9–0 lead, with Meyers picking up three of her team-high eight blocks in the sequence. The Hokies refused to go down easily, cutting the deficit to two at 14–12, but Sarah Watters swatted down one of 55 Jennifer Drennan assists to give game three to UMass.

The emotional high was very short-lasting as Tech had a little run of its own. Ten unanswered points to open the fourth game was all but the nail in the coffin for UMass.

The loss dropped the Minutewomen into fourth place in the Atlantic 10 at 4–2.

Hogancamp was the one bright spot on the night, recording 15 kills and 27 digs. She continues to lead the nation in digs, with an average of just under four a game. Watters finished with 12 kills.

UMass continues its season-long five-match homestand when it faces intrastate rival Harvard tomorrow. A-10 action resumes on Friday when the George Washington Colonials visit the Cage. Both matches are scheduled for 7 p.m. starts.

"We can't overlook Harvard. We have to improve in a lot of areas. They're the Ivy League champions and they're going to want to come in to our home and beat us. We have GW Friday, but we have to go day-by-day, match-by-match, and can't take non-conference opponents lightly."

New Hampshire cruises past Minutemen, 28-10

Wildcat tailback Azumah earns his 3rd straight UNH–UM game MVP

By Jonathan M. Place
Collegian Staff

The Bill Knight Trophy is awarded to the most valuable player in the annual New Hampshire–Massachusetts football game — in memory of UNH's longtime Sports Information Director and Yankee Conference Publicity Director.

For the fourth year in a row, the trophy will be engraved with the name of a Wildcat. For the third year in a row, junior tailback Jerry Azumah will be that Wildcat.

And for the third straight year, the Worcester native rubbed his nose into his state school. This time he rubbed it in for 156 yards and two touchdowns, enough to carry UNH (2–3, 2–2 Atlantic 10) to a 28–10 victory on Saturday.

"It makes me feel good to beat my state school," Azumah said. "I didn't even get recruited here."

Since Azumah was a freshman, he has dominated the line of scrimmage against the Minutemen. In 1995, he rushed for 127 yards on 14 carries with two touchdowns; while last year he recorded 210 yards rushing and 82 yards receiving. Overall, Azumah has rushed for 493 yards and five touchdowns, averaging 7.5 yards per carry in his three games against UMass.

On Saturday, Azumah took a while getting started, but by the second quarter was showing signs of having another career day. UMass (1–4, 1–4 A-10) was leading 3–0 with 9:04 left in the first half when sophomore quarterback Matt Cassano found tight end Jeff Tripp in the endzone for a 21–yard touchdown reception.

The drive took three plays and covered 46 yards of the field, but it was what led up to that drive which turned the game around for the Wildcats.

New Hampshire had the ball on UMass' 25 yard line on a second and nine play. Cassano dropped back to pass, checking off receivers to his left when Chris Price came barreling around UNH's right tackle, dangerously unprotected. Without any interference, Price smashed into Cassano head–on, leaving the quarterback on the ground in agony. The ball popped out, Joe Abasciamo recovered it, and UMass was on its way to controlling the game.

New Hampshire	28
Massachusetts	10

But on the next play it all went wrong. UMass fullback, Jamie Holston, who returned to Saturday's game after missing last week due to injury, slammed up the middle for a few yards before fumbling the ball and turning the possession back over to New Hampshire. It was then that the momentum completely switched over to the Wildcats' bench.

They went on to score their first touchdown of the day and sustained the lead for the duration of the game. The Minutemen only recorded 184 total yards on the day, while UNH racked up 340 — 200 on the ground.

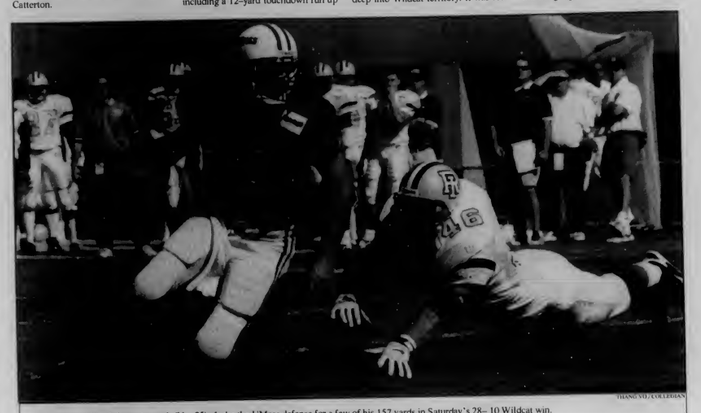
"We couldn't control the line of scrimmage today," coach Mike Hodges said. "Offensively, we didn't get anything done."

The Minutemen defense was solid during the first 20 minutes of play, forcing the Wildcats to four straight punts. It wasn't until UNH's fourth possession that it picked up a first down. But it was the second half, when UNH's offense spent over 17 minutes on the field, that UMass' defense began to show signs of fatigue.

"I thought they [UNH] were very balanced," UMass' Khari Samuel said. "Azumah is a big part of that. He's a shake and bake runner and he adds a nice punch at the end of every run."

The Wildcats were trying a bunch of different looks at UMass, but when nothing was working, they went back to their conventional style of football — what has worked in the past, and what worked on Saturday.

"We put in a two tight end set and that opened things up a little bit," UNH coach Bill Bowes said. "We were unsettled at the beginning. We didn't make the checks we should have made. That hurt us."



Coming out of the locker room at halftime, UMass was down 14–3, with 30 minutes left to turn things around. To give UNH a different look, Hodges benched Jeff Smith and replaced him with senior quarterback Anthony Catterton.

On his first pass of the season, Catterton found Kerry Taylor open 21 yards up the middle of the field. It would have spotted the Minutemen on their own 40 yard line. Unfortunately, a UMass holding penalty brought the ball all the way back to the eight yard line and doused any hope of a successful drive. The Minutemen had 11 penalties called against them Saturday for 86 yards. When UNH got the ball back, Azumah took control of the tempo and rushed for 44 yards on 4 carries — including a 12–yard touchdown run up the middle to put the Wildcats up 21–3.

The biggest play of the game for UMass went to the receiver known for making big plays — Doug Clark. On a third and six, Catterton stepped back in the pocket until he saw Clark breaking for the endzone up the left side of the field. Catterton gunned a 25–yard bullet to his receiver for his first touchdown pass of the season.

The drive was kept alive primarily due to a 23–yard carry by Catterton deep into Wildcat territory. It was second and 25, because of a five–yard penalty and a 10–yard rack, when Catterton took it himself and made up all but two of the 25 yards. The first down was made on the next play by freshman tailback Marcel Shipp. Shipp, who has been a surprise so far for the Minutemen, was kept virtually silent, rushing for 30 yards on the day.

"I'm very concerned about this football team, right now," Hodges said. "Our offense, our defense, our special teams, the 11 penalties. But we're in this thing together."

UM soccer cleans up against Owls, Hawks

By Jackie Leroux

Senior midfielder Ioenal Castma had his day on Sunday.

In a game against the No. 19 Owls of Temple that saw the Massachusetts men's soccer team light up the scoreboard, Castma was the star of the day.

Massachusetts	4
Temple	0

He scored two goals for the Minutemen, and played a key role in a pumped up UMass offense that spanked the Owls, 4–0.

Castma has been quietly productive so far this season, but he seemed to explode on Sunday.

"He has been a strong contributor throughout," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "Today he just happened to put the ball in the back of net."

In what was one of their best games of the season, the Minutemen came out strong against Temple, and dominated the field for the entire game. They put together a complete team effort, both offensively and defensively.

The team defense has been improving all season, and they pulled it out Sunday to completely shut out the Owls.

"The defense has been getting better and better all year," said sophomore keeper Todd Fowler, who had his first career shutout with the win.

"We worked the ball well and were just able to dominate the entire game."

Things were fairly quiet in the first half, until the 36:32 mark, when Castma hit his first goal. He was assisted by junior midfielder Jake Brodsky.

Immediately after the goal the energy of the team rose dramatically.

"When I came out, I was ready to play today," said Castma. "Everyone wanted to win. Everyone really wanted it, every-one came out pumped up and guys came ready to play.

"We were ready to go, and we worked together."

St. Joe's	1

Senior forward Mike Butler was the other star of the day, scoring two goals as well. His first came in the first half, at the 40:59 mark. He was assisted by junior Pie Garcia.

The score stood at 2–0 by halftime, and Temple coach Hugh McInaw seemed at a loss for what to do, as he made many substitutions throughout the game, including changing goalies, all to no avail.

In the second half UMass erased any hopes the Owls may have had of getting back into the game. Castma scored his second goal at 60:22. assisted by Butler and Brodsky.

Butler got his second goal at 68:20, with an assist from Fowler and freshman Seth Lilburn.

The Minutemen got their weekend underway with another win on Friday.

They took on St. Joseph's in the pouring rain, and came up victorious, 3–1.

After a quiet first half, UMass scored three consecutive goals in the second.

Senior Fabio Maniatty got things rolling with a goal from six yards out, followed by a penalty conversion from Brodsky, and another goal from Butler.

Fowler had four saves on the day, boosting his goals–against–average to 1.05.

Minutewoman soccer squad sweeps St. Joseph's, Temple

By Jorma Kansanen

Was there any doubt?

Was there any doubt that the No. 15 Massachusetts women's soccer team would bounce back after two losses in one week?

After two matches last weekend in Dallas, the Minutewomen (9–2, 5–0 Atlantic 10) took to the road again this weekend, facing St. Joseph's and Temple down in the metro–Philadelphia area. The A–10 conference is UMass' notorious stomping grounds.

Massachusetts	9

with that fact continuing on and on to the fine rhythm of the swish of the ball into the net.

Following up on a 3–0 start in the conference, UMass tallied two more wins this weekend in a 5–3 victory over the Hawks on Saturday, and a 9–0 stomping of the Owls yesterday afternoon. The Minutewomen put a brand new stamp on their history of A–10 dominance, with the nine goals scored against Temple — a new A–10 record for most goals scored in a game.

After losses to Cal-Berkeley and No. 4 Connecticut the week before last, UMass dropped in the rankings, but stayed in the top 20 in all three national polls. The Minutewomen capped a 30–3 difference in scoring against their five A–10 opponents this season with two more stand–up–and–take– notice wins, but unfortunately, another one of their corps might not be able to stand up — period.

With only a few minutes remaining in the 9–0 win over Temple, senior defender Amy Burrill went down with a knee injury, and the prospects do not look promising for UMass. After losing junior midfielder Robin Smith for this weekend due to knee and ankle problems, the Minutewomen look more like a M*A*S*H unit then a team that has been doing the mashing as of late.

For UMass coach Jim Rudy, the pleasure of a rout is counterbalanced with the reality of a team on the opposite side of healthy.

"Temple was a real good game for us, but it's disappointing because Amy might have [injured] her knee real bad," Rudy said. "We'll have to wait until tomorrow to find out about it, so we're somewhat banged up right now.

"It was a real good weekend, but we just got Amy back on the team, so it's sort of frustrating."

Sophomore midfielder Emma Kurowski (6 goals, 5 assists, 17 points) scored the eventual game winner for UMass in the 17th minute of the match against Temple, converting on a feed by freshman forward Kara Green. Green's assist on sophomore midfielder Tarah Tokarchik's goal to make the game 2–0 gave the freshman a team–high 10 assists on the season (6–10–22).

Massachusetts	5
St. Joe's	3

However, junior forward Sophie Lecot took over the team lead in points with her four goals and one assist this weekend, with three of those goals coming against the hapless Owls (11–1–23). Freshman midfielder Brooke Bartlett boosted her point total as well, racking up four assists in the Temple win (2–5–9), and sophomore goalkeeper Angie Napoli, who started Sunday's match, has not been scored on her first 10 appearances in the UMass net.

Lecot scored the eventual game winner in Saturday's match against St. Joseph's at the 59:26 mark, with the Hawks scoring three in the last 25:40 to no avail.

UMass had the match at 5–0, but after Rudy made seven changes in the lineup, St. Joe's took advantage — making senior keeper Danielle Dion's goals–against–advantage a tad bit higher than her 0.76 conference career mark before the match. Green led the team in scoring with two goals and an assist in the win.

Carolina schools rough up Massachusetts field hockey over its weekend road swing

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

A weekend getaway to North Carolina turned into a trip the Minutewomen would have probably preferred to stay away from, as UMass dropped a pair of contests in the Tar Heel state.

The No. 3 North Carolina Tar Heels showed why they command as much respect as they do in the field hockey world by handing the Minutewomen defeat by the difficult to swallow score of 10–2 in Chapel Hill, N.C.

Wake Forest wasn't as heavy on the goal–scoring, but still did not make things easier for UMass, as the Demon Deacons came away with a 4–1 victory.

The losses drop UMass overall record to 5–6. The Minutewomen are 2–0 in Atlantic 10 conference play.

The potent combination of Joy Driscoll, Kristen McCann and Cindy Werley was too much for the Minutewomen, as all three tallied twice in the Tar Heel win.

Two–time defending national champion UNC started the afternoon's scoring just under 15 minutes into the game on a Driscoll shot, with assists from Werley and Katie Barber. Twelve minutes later it was Driscoll tallied again on another assist from Werley.

Then Werley, who was a member of the 1996 U.S. Olympic squad along with Minutewoman coach Patty Shea, made her own mark in the goal column, with a shot off a McCann feed.

North CArolina	10
Massachusetts	2

Junior Nancy Pelligreen set up McCann's first goal, a score that put the Tar Heels up 4–0 just 15 seconds into the second half and started a second half offensive frenzy.

Werley and McCann traded goals before UMass faced a pair of penalty stroke situations. Barber and Moira McFadden scored within two minutes of each other, both on penalty strokes against UMass goalie Zowie Tucker.

The Minutewomen received an albeit small boost with a successful strike into North Carolina's circle with just over 18 minutes remaining in the game. Junior Erica Johnston, who leads the team in goals, pocketed a tally off a penalty corner. Junior Vicky Browne and senior Amy Ott were credited with the assists.

Freshman midfielder Sally Russo claimed UMass' second goal of the afternoon, on a shot with 7:30 remaining in the game.

Tucker made 15 saves in the UMass cage.

Sophomore goalie Michelle Crooks made her first start as a Minutewoman, on Sunday but Wake Forest did not roll out the welcome mat.

Janney struck first, but UMass' Chris Millbauer answered with a tally to even the score at one. Unfortunately for the Minutewomen, however, that was all the firepower they could muster and Wake was not done.

Wake Forest	4
Massachusetts	1

Samantha Rush scored an unassisted goal, while Jenny Everett, the team's leading scorer, connected on an assist from Kelly Malinoski to put Wake Forest up 3–1.

Journalist slayings investigated in Mexico

PARIS (AP) — An international watchdog group for journalists is calling on Mexico to boost efforts to track down the killers of reporters following an alarming series of attacks in recent months."With three news professionals murdered in 1997, Mexico is one of the countries with the highest number of journalists killed this year," Reporters Without Borders said Sept. 30.

Drug traffickers and members of the Mexican police have been accused of involvement in many of the 125 slayings of journalists since 1995, the report said.

The study, which described details of the beatings and murders of several reporters, demanded "a systematic investigation" when a journalist is attacked and for law enforcement officers to receive clear orders to respect journalists' safety.

Of six journalists' murders since 1996, "five remain unpunished today," the group said.

Reporters Without Borders linked the latest violence to political changes in Mexico. For the first time since it came to power in 1929, the Institutional Revolutionary Party lost its absolute majority in the Chamber of Deputies in July.

$62 mil. embezzled by corporate exec.

LOS ANGELES (AP) — A former meat-processing executive who stole $62 million in what prosecutors believe to be the largest act of corporate embezzlement in U.S. history was sentenced yesterday to five years in prison.

Yasuyoshi Kato, who was also ordered to pay back $100 a year while in custody, said nothing in court. An interpreter whispered the sentence to him.

The embezzled money was spent on lavish homes, cars, a citrus ranch and even a pair of $10,000 macaws for his estranged wife. Kato and his lawyer John Yzurdiaga declined to comment outside the courtroom.

"The sentence was a fair sentence," Assistant U.S. Attorney C. Michael Zweiback said.

Kato, a Japanese citizen, probably will be deported after serving his sentence, the prosecutor said.

Kato, who earlier pleaded guilty to six counts of wire, mail and tax fraud, was accused of taking $62 million while chief financial officer at Day-Lee Foods, a meat processing company in suburban Santa Fe Springs. Prosecutors claimed that for six or seven years, he wrote company checks to himself and his wife, taking out bank loans for the company to cover the theft. He forged daily accounting entries to cover up the scheme. Kato cannot pay back the money because his assets are gone, Zweiback said.

Textbook Annex defends position, faculty to blame for inflated prices

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Corespondent

Every semester students spend hundreds of dollars on textbooks, and are often left feeling short–changed during the Textbook Annex's buyback period. However, the manager of the Annex says that it is the professors who are at fault.

"It kills me every year," Darren Brelesky, a senior mechanical engineering major said.

Michael Murphy, a senior marketing major agrees, "I think UMass can come up with a better system."

Scott Cashman, manager of the Textbook Annex, says that the Annex is not to blame.

"Thirty–five percent of faculty book orders came in before buyback," Cashman said about last semester.

This percentage was a "huge increase" from previous semesters, according to Cashman. He said that most professors do not order their books until after buyback ends.

Cashman explained that 60–80 percent of faculty from schools of comparable size to UMass order their books before buyback.

According to Cashman, the Textbook Annex buys back books which have been ordered by professors at 50 percent of the publishers list price, but since few professors order their books early enough, many students cannot take advantage of buyback.

Cashman says that if professors do not order a book before buyback, the Textbook Annex buys the book back at "wholesale," which is "at most 30–35 percent of the publishers list price."

"Our goal is to put as many dollars back in students' pockets as we can," he said. In addition, the Textbook Annex discounts every new book over $10 by 5 percent.

"A lot of faculty have no idea that this is an issue," Political Science Chairperson Eric Einhorn said.

Einhorn cited several reasons why this might be a problem. "Most faculty never do anything on time, they're like students," Einhorn said.

Einhorn also pointed to the use of alternative textbook sources, saying that many faculty members feel that they are keeping alive some of the smaller bookstores in the area. Einhorn also said that courses are continuously being redesigned, which may prevent professors from ordering books early.

According to Einhorn, weak management at the Textbook Annex just a few years ago, deterred much of the faculty from using the Annex, but he says that the new management has worked hard to gain the trust of the faculty.

"It's going to take a while to get back faculty goodwill. The new leadership is doing a much better job," he said.

Professor R. Dean Ware, of the history department used to order from the Textbook Annex, but was unhappy with the service.

"They were too big to do the job," Ware said of his previous experience with the Textbook Annex, although he admits that things may be different now.

"They don't know, they don't care," Einhorn said about some of the faculty at UMass. "They don't know how much [books] cost," he said.

Randall Stokes, Chairperson of the sociology department, agrees that many professors may not know how this effects students.

"Most faculty haven't got a clue," Stokes said. "I'll bet they don't know about this deadline."

Stokes says that many professors in Amherst police creates ticket to enforce biking infractions

By Paul Hayes
Collegian Staff

AMHERST — The next time you ride your bike on the sidewalk it could be your last.

The Amherst police department, in cooperation with the bike transportation committee, are creating a ticket to punish cycling infractions.

The ticket, planned to be issued next spring, is pending the approval of Police Chief Donald Maia, and is an effort to promote safe cycling in Amherst.

"We won't allow cyclists to just do what they want," Maia said.

Some infractions could include traffic and equipment violations, and the tickets could carry fines of $5 to $15.

According to Maia, a warning card listing punishable violations will be issued this fall, to educate people about what biking rules they have to follow.

While no record of complaints in regard to cyclists are kept, many Amherst residents said that they constantly have to avoid bikes which drive recklessly and run intersections.

"There's a lot of idiots out there, bikes can be dangerous if you're not careful," junior English major, an employee of the University of Massachusetts Bike Co–op, said.

During the past 14 months, seven accidents and one death, occurring on Route 202, involving cyclists were reported to the Amherst Police Department.

Reactions to the ticket are mixed.

"I don't like it, I think we're being policed a little too much," Brian McKinnon, a senior environmental science major said.

Parker Ramspott, of Bicycle World Too in Amherst, believes that bike rules should be enforced, adding that bikes are motor vehicles that must follow the rules of the road.

Yet, Ramspott said, cyclists rights are not being defended well enough.

Motorists are not cited when they endanger cyclists as often as they should be, and often ignore the fact that lesser vehicles have the right of way, he said.

"I was coming home, and some guy pulled into Hobart [Lane], he almost cut me off," McKinnon said, "it happens a lot."

One problem for cyclists is that they are often not given enough room to ride.

"If they're going to ticket, I want a lane to bike in," McKinnon said.

Some students claimed that they would rather just drive cars than put up with bike tickets, while others dismissed the tickets as a pointless regulation.

Junior animal science major Brandon Gillard, a UMass Bicycle Co– op employee said, "I think people will just blow them off."

According to Noel Ryan, Amherst Superintendent of Public Works, plans for addingbike lanes to town roads are being considered.

Discussions with the bike transport committee are underway to create designated bike lanes along North Pleasant and South Pleasant Streets, as well as Amity Place, Ryan said.

These lanes are being considered in conjunction with plans to renovate the intersection of Routes 9 and 116, and the intersection of Main, Amity and North Pleasant streets, he said.

The lanes may be forced to end prior to the intersections, due to the lack of space needed in creating turn lanes.

"There are a lot of competing interests at the intersections, including cars, parking and bikes," Ryan said.

While bike lanes on some streets are feasible, many Amherst roads are too narrow to accommodate them.

While most roads are 20 to 22 feet wide, bike lanes are typically four to five feet wide. By adding one to both lanes of traffic, the automobile lanes could be constricted to ten feet wide, according to Ryan.

Typically, it is desirable for roads to be a minimum twelve feet wide.

While the creation of bike lanes would appease area cyclists, widening roads could pose additional problems. Adding bicycle lanes to Amherst streets would impact parking in town by narrowing spaces in some areas or worse, eliminating some parking spaces completely.

Clinton employs line-item veto, 38 congressional projects nixed

By Terence Hunt
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — In a blow to both Democrats and Republicans, President Clinton used his line-item veto yesterday to kill 38 military construction projects that Congress had added to a huge spending bill at a cost of $287 million.

California — which Clinton carried in the last presidential election — lost four projects worth $28 million. Texas — which voted for Republican Bob Dole — lost three valued at $22.5 million. Covering 24 states, Clinton's hit list eliminated projects such as $20 million for a wharf at Virginia's Norfolk Naval Shipyard, $17.9 million for dredging and pier improvements at the Mayport Naval Station in Florida, $16 million for new rail track at Fort Carson, Colo., and $14 million for a flight simulation training facility at Kirtland Air Force Base, N.M.

"These are tough calls involving real money and hard choices," the president said at an Oval Office ceremony announcing his decision.

In a politically sensitive gesture to lawmakers whose votes he well might need, Clinton avoided labeling any of the projects as "pork barrel" programs or wasteful spending. Instead, he said it was simply a case of "fiscal discipline" and priorities. Many of the projects have merit, Clinton said, but "this is simply the wrong time." His gentle words appeared aimed at easing the pain among lawmakers whose votes he wants in uphill battles on free trade and other tough issues.

Sen. Ted Stevens, R-Alaska, chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, called Clinton's veto "an arbitrary, political decision to make the president look good." He said he would begin preparing a bill to override Clinton's veto - though it might not cover all the 38 projects Clinton eliminated.

Congress has 30 days to try to override any or all the vetoes. Sen. Conrad Burns, R-Mont., chairman of the Senate Appropriations subcommittee, said, "I'm disappointed in the bill being chopped up like this." Taking issue with the White House, Burns said, "We're entitled to a priority list, too."

But Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said he supported Clinton's veto and wished he had eliminated more projects.

Clinton is the first president in history to wield the line-item veto, which allows him to strike individual items from appropriation bills. Using his power for only the second time, Clinton could have vetoed more.

In fact, Congress had added 145 projects to the Pentagon's military construction proposal; Clinton allowed 107 of the additions to stand, adding more than $500 million to the construction price tag - bringing it to a total of nearly $9 billion.

The president spared add-on projects such as day-care centers, a chapel, military barracks and dining halls, deciding that they contributed to the quality of life and well-being of members of the military, said budget director Franklin Raines.

More than anything else, Clinton's veto was intended as a signal that he is ready to slash spending bills swollen by Congress. "The main savings from the line-item veto come not from what you line-item, but from the savings that you get by encouraging fiscal discipline in future bills," said Gene Sperling, the president's top economic adviser.

The political pain appeared generally divided in a Congress dominated by Republicans. The 24 states affected are represented in the Senate by 21 Democrats and 27 Republicans. Of the 38 deleted projects 26 are in House districts represented by Republicans, 12 by Democrats.

Former Secretary of Labor Reich to speak at UM

Ken Tatro
Collegian Correspondent

Former Secretary of Labor, Professor Robert B. Reich will be speaking at the University of Massachusetts on Thursday.

According to Professor Jerry Epstein, chairman of the economics department, Reich will be speaking about the widening inequality between the "haves and the have nots," and improving educational backgrounds and skills so American workers can compete in the global economy.

Epstein describes Reich as one of the foremost economic policy philosophers in the country and says that the Economic department is "extremely excited" that Reich is speaking at UMass.

Reich, who served as Secretary of Labor during President Clinton's first term, is currently a University Professor and the Maurice B. Hexter Professor of Social and Economic Policy at Brandeis University.

He is the author of seven books, including "The Work of Nations" and the recently published "Locked in the Cabinet."

In addition to these works Reich has published more than 200 articles on the global economy, the changing nature of work, and the centrality of human capital.

While serving as Secretary of Labor, Reich helped pass and implement the Family and Medical Leave Act and assisted in raising the minimum wage for the first time since 1989.

Under Reich's leadership, the Department of Labor passed several initiatives intended to build the skills of American workers. One of these initiatives, the School–to–Work Opportunities Act, which was signed into law in 1994, is aimed at helping to ease the transition from secondary education to the work place for the 75 percent of America's youth who do not graduate from college.

the sociology department do not teach the same course every year, which may prevent them from ordering the same books every semester. Stokes also said that many professors design courses over the summer, and may not know what books they will use until August.

Stokes said that with only one month during the winter to prepare for the spring semester, the number of professors who order their books before buyback should be higher. Cashman says that this is not the case, and that most professors will order their spring books in January and February, after school has already started.

Another factor is that publishers do not like when classes make use of used books. They combat used books by constantly publishing new editions, and by selling packages of books.

"Some package deals are good values, but not all," Cashman said. Despite the opposition of publishers, the Textbook Annex has increased the stock of used books from 15 percent, 10 years ago, to 35 percent, according to Cashman.

Cashman said that at the middle of each semester, the Textbook Annex advertises directly to the faculty, to get them to order books before buyback.

"We've been working with the Campus Center Commission to work on that, to get the word out to faculty, to get orders in," Cashman said.

The textbook Annex even offers incentives to faculty who get their orders in before buyback. "They are trying to give bonuses to faculty, trying to sweeten the deal for the faculty," Einhorn says.

Some students will not sell their books back, because they do not think it is worth it. Colin Clark is a senior neuropsychology major, who spent $450 on books one semester, and does not sell his books back. "I feel cheated, I'd rather just keep the book," Clark said.

Darren Brelesky spent $300 on books this semester — the third semester in a row he has spent over $300 on books. "I was not satisfied," Brelesky said of last semester's buy back, "That's why I usually don't return them."

Michael Murphy spent $250 on books this semester, and says he has never been happy with buyback. "I think they should have some sort of better buyback system," Murphy said.

Disease causing protein identified

By Malcolm Ritter
Associated Press

An American won the Nobel Prize in medicine yesterday for discovering a startling new type of germ: a Jekyll-and-Hyde protein that causes mad cow disease and other deadly brain-destroying illnesses.

The prize, worth $1 million this year, went to Dr. Stanley B. Prusiner, 55, a biochemistry professor at the University of California at San Francisco. The announcement was made by the Karolinska Institute in Stockholm, which awards the prize. Prusiner was cited for his 1982 discovery of prions. These insidious proteins are considered an entirely new type of disease-causing agent, distinct from bacteria, viruses, fungi or parasites.

The finding was controversial — and still is — because prions, unlike other germs, contain no genetic material; they are simply proteins.

The human diseases caused by prions are rare. But scientists said Prusiner's work might help researchers understand more common brain disorders like Alzheimer's and Parkinson's diseases. Prions have been in the news lately because they are blamed for a variant of the brain-wasting Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease that has killed at least 20 people, mostly in Britain. The victims are thought to have gotten the prions by eating products made from cattle with mad cow disease.

Prusiner began his work in 1972, when as a medical resident he had a patient with Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease, or CJD. At the time, the cause of CJD was a mystery.

Ten years later, Prusiner's research led him to propose a scientific heresy: that proteins he called prions caused CJD and some other infectious diseases that leave areas of the brain looking like sponges.

Prusiner and others went on to show that prions are Jekyll-and-Hyde proteins. People and other animals have prions normally in their bodies, particularly on brain cells. Nobody knows what they do.

The difference between the Jekyll-and-Hyde forms is how they are folded. When shaped one way, they are benign. But if folded differently, they cause disease. And when these rogue proteins encounter normal prions in the brain, they convert the normal forms to the disease-causing shape.

In time, the buildup causes brain disease.

Prions cause not only infectious diseases but also some very rare inherited ones, including fatal familial insomnia and Gertsmann-Straussler-Scheinker disease, a form of dementia. The idea that prions cause some infectious diseases is popular, but not all scientists accept it.

"There are still people one respects very much who believe that a virus might be involved," said Zach Hall, director of the National Institute of Neurological Disorders and Stroke, which has supported Prusiner's work since 1975. But he added, "I think it's very clear this protein is, if not at the heart of the action, very near to it."

Lars Edstroem, a professor of neurology at the Karolinska Institute, declared after the prize was announced: "There are still people who don't believe that a protein can cause these diseases, but we believe it."

Prusiner, reached at a meeting in Bethesda, Md., was asked if the Nobel would stop criticism of his ideas.

Hamas leader returns to Gaza City

By Laura King
Associated Press

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip —The spiritual leader of Hamas returned to a tumultuous homecoming in the Gaza Strip today after being freed by Israel in exchange for two Mossad agents captured in a bungled assassination attempt in Jordan.

The swap of Sheik Ahmed Yassin and the Israeli agents was worked out in nearly two weeks of secret talks between Israel and Jordan. The exchange deeply embarrassed Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu because it contradicts his credo of being tough on terrorism.

Yassin, the founder of the radical Palestinian Hamas movement, was released from Israel's Ayalon prison five days ago and flown to Jordan for medical treatment. Yassin had served eight years of a life sentence for ordering the killing of Palestinians collaborating with Israel.

By agreeing to Yassin's release, Netanyahu now has much less leverage in demanding that Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat arrest large numbers of Hamas activists to prevent terror attacks in Israel. Hamas has carried out more than a dozen suicide bombings in Israel since 1994.

Netanyahu, speaking to reporters this evening, said the government had decided to set up a committee to investigate the failed assassination attempt.

But, he said, "We have to continue to strike out at terror relentlessly. We expect that any peace loving country will understand the need to fight terror and cooperate with us in the fight against terror."

Netanyahu said the committee would be made up of Nahum Admoni, a former head of Mossad; Rafi Peled, a former police chief; and Yossi Ciechanover, a former legal adviser to the Defense Ministry. As part of today's exchange, Israel also freed at least 19 Palestinian and Jordanian prisoners who returned to their homes today. Eleven Palestinians, including activists for two small, radical PLO factions, were released in the West Bank and met with Arafat. Israel radio said an additional 40 to 50 detainees were to be freed in the next two weeks.

A Jordanian military helicopter carrying Yassin, a 61-year-old quadriplegic, touched down in Gaza City this afternoon. Yassin was taken out in a wheelchair, moved into an ambulance and driven to a sports stadium, where he called for Palestinian unity in a speech to thousands of supporters.

"There must be no divisions among the Palestinian people," Yassin whispered to an aide who repeated the words. The supporters, many of whom had waited in the sun for hours, cheered, whistled and chanted "Allahu Akbar," or God is great.

Arafat did not welcome Yassin to Gaza, choosing instead to hold routine meetings in the West Bank. Yassin, the founder of Hamas, which opposes the Israeli-Palestinian peace accords, is Arafat's biggest political rival, and Yassin's presence in Gaza will strengthen Hamas further.

The U.S. Mideast peace negotiator, Dennis Ross, arrived in the region today, and met with Arafat ahead of the resumption of Israeli-Palestinian peace talks later this evening. Talks were suspended in March after Israel started building homes for Jews in a disputed area of Jerusalem.

Before leaving Amman, Yassin called on the world to help Palestinians realize their dream of statehood. He told a news conference that if peaceful means failed, the Palestinians would continue to resist Israeli occupation.

"The cease-fire cannot be obtained until the occupation is over," Yassin said, apparently dismissing recent reports that Hamas had offered Israel a 10-year moratorium on terror attacks in exchange for participating in talks on the future of the region.

The Hamas offer was reportedly made two days before Israeli agents of the Mossad spy agency attempted to kill another Hamas leader, Khalid Mashaal, in Amman on Sept. 25, by injecting him with poison outside his office. The two agents were captured and others involved in the bungled operation took refuge in the Israeli Embassy in Amman.

FBI looking for driver with $15 million

By Paul Nowell
Associated Press

KINGS MOUNTAIN, NC — FBI agents launched a nationwide manhunt yesterday for an armored car driver accused of taking off in a company van with up to $15 million in cash.

The same company — Loomis, Fargo & Co. — was stung in March by an $18 million heist, the largest armored car robbery in U.S. history. Nearly all of that money was recovered.

David Scott Ghantt, 27, who disappeared Saturday after he went to work at the Loomis Fargo warehouse in Charlotte, was indicted on federal bank larceny charges and is considered armed and dangerous. "He is the only suspect at this point," said FBI spokeswoman Joanne Morley, noting that no force was used to break into the warehouse and Ghantt's unlocked red pickup truck was found parked in the grass outside.

Company officials declined to be interviewed about the latest heist.

At the gray double-wide mobile home Ghantt shared with his wife in this community 30 miles west of Charlotte, the shades were drawn and a tarp covered what appeared to be construction materials in the front yard. A pile of new bricks, still strapped together, sat a few yards away.

"Please don't bother me," said a woman who answered the phone and quickly hung up. She did not respond when a reporter knocked on the door.

Later, two FBI agents pulled up and questioned the woman and neighbors in the quiet cul-de-sac.

Neighbor Walter Dabbs, described Ghantt as a reclusive man who seemed to work long hours.

"He never threw his hand up when I'd wave hello," said Dabbs, who also moved into the neighborhood about a year ago. "Both of them worked all day and they wouldn't usually come home until after dark."

Doomed bill would slow abortion rate

Once again, the people who say they are opposed to abortion have been given an opportunity to help prevent it. And once again, they are passing.

The opportunity comes in the form of a bill introduced last spring by Republican Sen. Olympia Snowe of Maine. The Equity in Prescription Medication and Contraceptive Coverage Act would require health insurers to cover contraceptive prescriptions and services to the same extent that they cover comparable health costs, such as prescription drugs. It is not hard to do the math on this one. Women who do not use contraception are 15 times more likely to become pregnant than women who do. Half of the 3.6 million unintended pregnancies that occur each year in this country end in abortion. So increasing birth-control use would also lower the rate of abortion.

FOCUS ON WOMEN

SARA ECKEL

Indeed, to most Americans the notion that birth control prevents abortion is as simple as two-plus-two-equals-four. It is only the pro-life legislators and anti-abortion zealots who can't quite grasp it. They are also the only ones who can't seem to tell the difference between having an abortion and taking a birth-control pill. Making contraception more affordable for American women will go a long way toward lowering both the rates of unwanted pregnancy and abortion.

But that is not the only reason to support the Contraceptive Coverage Act. Because the bill will also correct a brazen unfairness that women in this country have long endured. We hear a lot about the wage gap — the fact that women earn 75 cents for every dollar than men earn — but less discussed is the cost gap, especially the medical-cost gap. Currently, women of child-bearing age pay 68 percent more in out-of-pocket health care expenses than men do, and this has been attributed in large part to contraception costs. Because while 97 percent of traditional indemnity policies cover prescription drugs in general, only one-third cover birth-control pills, the most popular form of contraception. And half of these plans do not cover any form of elective birth control.

Oddly enough, the majority of employment-related insurance plans do cover sterilization and abortion. So once again, you would think the pro-life forces would want health insurers to cover contraception at least at the same rate that they cover abortion. But thus far, there have been few takers. Although pro-life Sen. Harry Reid (D-Nev.) has co-sponsored the Senate bill, only two other pro-life senators — John Warner (R-Va.) and Kay Bailey Hutchison (R-Texas) — have signed on. And in the House, pro-life representatives have been equally under-whelmed by the companion bill. In addition, some anti-abortion groups have been downright hostile to the proposal.

"I would be shocked on both the House and Senate side if any pro-life congressman or woman would support [this bill]," the Rev. Pat Mahony of the Christian Defense Coalition told the Newhouse News Service.

In stating why her group opposed the bill, Judie Brown of the American Life League spoke with remarkable candor: "[The bill] ignores the tragic physical, emotional and spiritual side effects of all contraceptives," she said in a statement. "The contraceptive mentality rejects a child as a gift from God." If Brown and her cohorts believe that contraception is evil, they are certainly entitled to that opinion. They are also entitled to believe that it is a sin to have sex for any reason other than procreation. However, I have a crazy hunch that the majority of Americans don't quite see it that way.

Unfortunately, I also have a bad feeling that this utterly reasonable bill will be squelched by those who claim to speak for life.

Letters to the Editor

Intelligence knows no color

To the Editor:

Academic excellence is not a race-linked characteristic. Brilliance, like stupidity, comes in all colors. Getting good grades is not a white thing.

That's why I believe that columnist Viraphanh Douangmany and other critics are mistaken when they view the proposed Honors College as a bastion of white privilege rather than a benefit to outstanding students of all ethnic backgrounds.

I graduated from the University this year, and I know from personal experience that students in the Honors Program are all bright, but they're certainly not all white. Fans of The Bell Curve might want us to believe that only affluent white students can maintain a GPA of 3.2 or higher (the requirement for Honors Program eligibility), but anybody who's smart enough to be an honors student is smart enough to see through that racist nonsense.

It's always a good idea to keep a wary eye on the administration. Chancellor Scott, in my opinion, is not a racist, but he is a bonehead and a mealy-mouthed weasel. He might very well, in concert with the rest of the generally uninspiring UMass leadership, find a way to screw up the Honors College. However, if the current Honors Program serves as a model for the Honors College, there is no reason to fear a white supremacist agenda, and every reason to anticipate that a commitment to multicultural inclusiveness will go hand in hand with a commitment to excellence.

Political comments need more research

To the Editor:

On Thursday's edition of the Daily Collegian Leigh Torbin wrote, 'If you saw In the Name of the Father, you know how unjust the English system of government can be, but the EFA has one thing right. Relegation.'

This prompted me to wonder if this was a political comment and if so, why is it in the sports page?

If this was intended as a link in the article it has to be said it was an ill informed and poor choice.

The comment itself is inaccurate in many respects. There is no organization called the EFA, instead I believe the organization in question is the Football Association (FA) which invented the game. This organization is not a department of the 'unjust government' as hinted in the article, but is independent of it. There was also no mention of the play-offs which occur for extra promotion places.

What I believe was a political comment is ridiculously ill informed. The film itself did not even deal with the system of government in the United Kingdom, which is a Democracy and not a Republic. The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, which contains Scotland, Wales, England and Northern Ireland has one Parliament in London. The whole government changed last year after a 'General Election' which occurs at least every five years. There is no such thing as an English government.

I have seen the film mentioned in the article and it is pure pro-IRA propaganda, even the actors concerned stated as much after the film had been made. Listening to the dialogue in the film was like listening to the arguments of Sinn Fein and the IRA which I am pushed to find relevant to a sports page. It may interest the author of the article to know that both Gerry Adams and Martin McGuiness were elected in the previously mentioned elections but then refused to take their seats in Parliament.

They are two MPs from Northern Ireland with the majority being of the opposite political viewpoint, yet they air their views via the media instead of in government. They have their reasons for doing so, but again these have nothing at all to do with sport.

So I again ask what relevance to a sports page is there in the comment made by the author? The political aspects and religious bigotry which contribute to events in Northern Ireland are extremely complex, giving rise to strong emotions which could never be captured in a film. To even suggest that the film in question is in anyway accurate only succeeds in displaying the author's ignorance of events in Northern Ireland.

Could you suggest, therefore, that the author does his homework outside the cinema in future and leaves his own politics outside the sports page. Thanks.

Removing the blindfold of feminism

Give me back the old days of Playboy and strip joints! It was easier to be a feminist when that's all I thought sexism was about. I cheered for the obvious issues of equal pay as men, reproductive rights and Title IV.

I would criticize my male friends for chauvinist comments and turn up my nose at the billboard for the local strip joint. Then I read a book over the last winter break. It was called Outrageous Acts and Everyday Rebellions by Gloria Steinem. As I read the eloquent words of a true feminist I became enlightened and an internal struggle began.

It was like opening a door to a new world.

I was reveling in the enlightenment of seeing society from such a different light. Then I began to wonder, was this one book having too much of an influence on my thinking. After all, had I just become some lemming blindly following one author?

Jill Carroll

Suddenly I became aware of the depth and intricacy of sexism around me. I stopped to notice things, like when you're in a mixed sex group which sex is doing most of the talking and interrupting. I began to wish for those strip joint billboards and chauvinist remarks.

They are at least easily identified and therefore able to be fought against.

Now it seemed that this, our very language, was subversive to women and women's advancement in the world. This is a frightening revelation. Now I was left in a great deal of turmoil. I was reveling in the enlightenment of seeing society from such a different light. Then I began to wonder, was this one book having too much of an influence on my thinking. After all, had I just become some lemming blindly following one author? Or as in the book, is sexism really that prevalent while society is telling me I should doubt myself and accept it? Our ability to fight sexism is hampered if not eliminated because we cannot even identify it.

This inability to see sexism comes from the blindfold placed over our eyes by society.

A blindfold that doesn't let us see oppression but rather "norms." It doesn't let us see sexism but "tradition." Or is this all just brainwashing by some crazy femi-nazi? It's a constant battle between trying to throw off the invisible harness placed on women by society but then wondering if the harness actually exists at all. I don't know the answer, but harness or not I have a feeling the battle itself could be just as important as it's outcome.

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian is published Monday through Friday during the University of Massachusetts calendar semester. The Collegian is financially independent from the University of Massachusetts, operating solely on revenues generated by advertising sales. The paper was founded in 1890 as Aggie Life, became the College Signal in 1901, the Weekly Collegian in 1914 and then the Tri-Weekly Collegian in 1956. The Collegian has been published daily since 1967, and has been a broadsheet publication since January 1994. Honors college debate continues: who leaves a sinking ship first?

The creation of state sanctioned elitism

In Defense Of The UMass Flagship

The proposal either has destructive ideas that will hurt nearly everybody, or promising ideas that would have worked for the entirety of the University of Massachusetts yesterday, without exacerbating educational apartheid. Additionally, proponents seem inordinately concerned with the appearance of a good education rather than the fact of a good education. This not only applies to having a "pretty" campus for the honors college, but to the constantly repeated idea that UMass will enhance its "image" if it is located next to it. Let me quote from one other purveyor of the scheme, Aaron Spencer (from the Collegian, April 28):

"By and large, what we are proposing already exists. It just hasn't been legitimized and given a name." Spencer argued that by "legitimizing" the honors program, more prestige would be brought to the entire UMass system, and all graduates of UMass would benefit from this increased perception.

And for all of the squeamish students who came running to the defense of Aaron Spencer, I'm going to include one more lengthy quote from the April 28 Collegian:

"Spencer replied that the board would be asking the Massachusetts State Legislature to fund the initial expense of building a Commonwealth College, and that the operating costs of an honors college would be similar to those of the already existing Honors Program at UMass Amherst. We will ask the legislature for funding of a brand new building," Spencer said.

"We have no intention of the Commonwealth College coming at the expense of the other colleges or students. On going funding really is not as critical as initial funding. The same 1,600 students currently in the UMass Honors Program would be in the Commonwealth College. The only additional expense comes in creating the building."

Does anyone else notice the logical inconsistencies in what Mr. Spencer said here? First of all, it is unlikely that most of the students "currently" in the honors program will get the privilege to receive a "Commonwealth College" degree. I don't think (or at least I hope) that the thing isn't going to be built that fast. Furthermore, if the new college would "double" the number of students enrolled in the current honors program (as reportedly said earlier by Norman Aitken, Collegian, April 3) how could the operating costs possibly be "similar" to the existing program the way Aaron Spencer says it will be?

Yes, for all those who self-righteously protest about the "distressing" given to Mr. Spencer: his own words display either seriously flawed arguments, or simply outright deception. In either case, we can hardly blame students for being justifiably emotional in their response.

In his draft proposal, Mr. Koplik totally avoids the word "elite," and very cleverly deploys catchwords like "empowered." Very slick. but somehow I think supporters of this scheme must continually work hard to resist using one particular phrase made popular by The Bell Curve: "the cognitive elite."

To be sure, part of it comes down to the questions about what the origin of merit and achievement are. Whatever you think causes it , some people perform better and excel more than others, and maybe this performance should be rewarded in order to facilitate future achievement. The question is, why can't the current honors program achieve this and other goals? If there was a problem, why was no initiative made to remedy or improve the honors program? Maybe the authors of this program feel that there's power in a name, and that "graduating with honors" doesn't sound good if in the same breath you say "UMass bachelors degree."

Obviously, the solution, according to them, is to create a whole new apparatus for stamping out truly elite students without any of that old baggage: they will be "Commonwealth College" young men and women.

Right now, UMass Amherst is considered the "flagship;" the best in the state. True, this may involve some degree of elitism, but at least this elitism is top-heavy with 25,000-or- so undergraduates and graduates comprising the largest campus In Massachusetts. How will it be in the self-interest of the majority who are left behind to suddenly become No. 27 You are out of your mind if you think that a physically segregated campus, located on top of the rest of UMass, will not eventually generate hostility and resentment, especially when the facilities down below continue to fall apart.

Even if you didn't care about wasting taxpayers' money, do you really think this would be some fiscal boon to UMass? While things may be looking rosy right now, eventually there will be an economic contraction that will have corresponding implications for state finances. Some decision makers are going to say to themselves "Hmm.... we have a fixed block of revenue for public higher education, how are we going to spend it all? Look at that Commonwealth College. (Why, that's where my kid goes!)."

E. Okwa Fox Tree

So when the time comes, it will likely make budget cutbacks more severe than if the honors college were not there. And even if that day were never to come, the honors college would likely detract from the potential growth in funding that UMass would otherwise have had.

Administrators, faculty, and union representatives from different campuses have already bickered with one another about the location of the proposed school. "It's going to be built somewhere," they all say with resignation, "so we might as well try to get a piece of the action." They've even considered installing multiple versions of it across the state. Don't worry, they will try to build support for this scheme by promising to recruit people of color and maintain a diverse campus — but, don't be fooled.

What can you do about it? I could give you the obligatory advice about contacting your legislator, but in reality, our democracy often times doesn't work as well as you might expect. Nevertheless, this is the principle thing that supporters of the honors college are already doing, so you might as well counterbalance what they say.

So, what else can you do that won't work for supporters? (I know that describing these things will be a lot easier than actually doing them...)

1. Litmus test every potential hire that the administration trots out in front of you!

2. Contact alumni to protest this scheme. Ask potential donors to voice their concerns before they increase UMass' endowment. (Mention the decrease in status that their degree from UMass will have).

3. Network with other state college campuses so that the scheme is not simply resurrected elsewhere.

4. "Honors Students Against the Honors College," anyone?

5. Draft an alternative appropriation of funds that would potentially result in more cost-effective benefits to this state. Don't worry about having the correct statistics though; proponents of the honors college make up their own numbers, anyway!

6a. Kindly ask your professors what they think of the honors college scheme.

6b. Depending on the answer to the above question, tactfully ask your professors if they want to elect new faculty senate representatives.

The principle reasons why we should oppose the "Commonwealth College," besides the fact that it wouldn't achieve even its poorly-striated goals, are that we should repudiate the ideology from which this proposal springs forth, and we should eliminate the precedent that it would set. It has an underlying social agenda that will increase socioeconomic disparities by stratifying a public-sector institution whose principle intent was to do the opposite. (Perhaps some would consider this result to be a "success," especially since this honors college scheme will not be the last like-minded attempt at restructuring how tax revenue is spent.)

Editor's note: the side bar to the left is attached to this article

When the Titanic sank, 60 percent of the first class passengers survived, while 56 percent of the second class, 75 percent of the third class, and 76 percent of the crew drowned. With similar results, soon, the Massachusetts public university flagship will have its parts scavenged in order to construct a lifeboat so that a small "elite" can safely get away.

A verdict has already been handed down: instead of cooperating to repair the major leaks, everyone at UMass can watch as their former comrades bail out and sail away. Of course, after their own ship has been dismembered to save these precious and deserving few, a large and un- repairable hole will have been made below the waterline, where it may take a while before many people notice it. (Some administrators abroad the UMass Amherst will try to convince passengers that the hole is not there). Despite assurances of "independent funding," the honors college will become a hideous implementation of state-sanctioned, institutional self-consumption.

It's difficult to obtain detailed and concrete plans about the college and the speed and stealth make it a little more suspicious.

Here's what we do know: former Governor Weld (a graduate of "Corporateweld College," class of 1966, summa cum laude) and other legislative agencies have appointed many administrators to oversee higher education in Massachusetts. Interspersed among these appointees and elected chairpersons are all sorts of staff personnel. Don't get me wrong, I think a bureaucracy can sometimes be quite tolerable and necessary, but it's another matter when someone gets a job in the State House because of nepotism.

Now, our one-time governor and his ilk are fiscal conservatives, and they have often opposed, slowed down and cut appropriations for state public higher education. Weld is also a socially-moderate Republican, but many of his more conservative friends (both Republicans and Democrats) are some pretty sick puppies who make him look like a nice guy. Furthermore, Weld is now gone, and it is his depraved, much more conservative colleagues who are in the ascendent, in this state and nation-wide. (Witness the outcome of the ambassador-to-Mexico debacle).

Go ahead, pick your favorite administrators: it is quite possible that they got their jobs because they could be trusted to implement the agendas of various state politicians.

E. Okwa Fox Tree

Frequently, their first priority has been to oversee the effective downsizing of UMass and not increase the quality of your education. Oftentimes, situations are constructed where UMass is forced to act like a trapped animal, chewing off part of it own body in order to survive. (Just look at the School of Education, or the honors college itself). It is interesting to ponder the following: If your education gets worse because of downsizing, well, that means the decrease in performance justifies downsizing UMass some more.

But make no mistake, there is a very clear and insidious doctrine behind the honors college plans. It is fundamentally an ideology which undervalues the role that social forces play in determining the outcome of our lives. Contrary to any egalitarian proclamations, "some people are simply born better than others;" whether it is through some superlative genetic endowment or having been given a better soul. Though the practitioners of these beliefs would publicly deny that this is what they think, they usually see these inborn differences as being associated with class and race.

At this point, I could tell you about my own views regarding the origins of motivation, aptitude and intellectual achievement. However, I would be whispering against the prevailing wind. There are too many institutions in our society for whom the replication and transmission of such beliefs is the superlibuous metabolic by product of their natural activity. The same corporations and institutions that run our economy shape everyone's beliefs, and help individuals with similar beliefs get elected to office.

Suddenly, a proposal comes out of the blue, under the guise of "improving" state public higher education, and it's on the fast track to implementation. Did a paradigm shift occur in the forces that control our society? Did the assortment of downsize- driven appointees become more convinced of the utility of public higher education?

No, the answer is that the Commonwealth College is consistent with the aforementioned ideological agenda. If you can appoint a wealthier hue of white, it will be funded.

Perhaps, if you look at early drafts of this proposal you might gain useful insights into the true goals and motivations of this scheme, even if the proposal is now different. The earliest such document I could find was a "concept paper" (dated Nov. 27, 1996) written by Chancellor Stanley Koplik and published in the Massachusetts Teachers Association's monthly newsletter The Leader (Jan. 1997). Witness the true ideological underpinning of the whole "Commonwealth College" scheme:

- Faculty are to have "renewable term contracts... without assignment to rank or tenure" — How many current UMass professors would be happy about that?
- "The Commonwealth College Board of Trustees will be empowered through additional governance authority... it will be exempted from restrictive state personnel and purchasing regulations... Exemption from customary state building requirements and procedures will be sought for the College." This could mean many things. After all, some might consider the minimum wage to be "restrictive personnel regulation." Or, could it be about safeguards against nepotism? Those pesky "purchasing regulations" and "building requirements and procedures" might be laws concerning contract building. (Some old-timers at UMass can tell you stories about the questionable awarding of contracts for the construction of some of their buildings on the Amherst campus during its expansion in the late 1960's). Or, could all of these "regulations, requirements, and procedures" refers to affirmative action? Might they refer to the right to organize a union?
- "Each major will identify student outcomes, assess student success in achieving identified academic skills and knowledge..." — Gee, haven't current UMass students been pleading for better advising for years?
- "The college will "require a capstone project for graduation." — This is already the current policy of the UMass honors program.
- "The commitment to excellence will be visually observed in physical plant and grounds that are attractive, well maintained, and inviting to current and potential members of the College community." — Why aren't all of the current UMass students good enough to receive such consideration?
- "The Commonwealth's capacity to produce outstanding students far exceeds the number of intended for enrollment (sic) at Commonwealth College." — What happens when the number of qualified students eventually exceeds the 2,500 slots proposed for the new college? Don't the entrance requirements necessarily become more restrictive? Or, do you just make it cost more?
- "special commitment to the college by designating full scholarships for 200 students per year to include tuition, fees, room, and board." — hen was the last time the state offered a free education to 10 percent (let alone 200) of the undergraduates at UMass; even with all of its present honors students?
- "...it is not intended that the college will draw resources from other institutions, each of which has a particular mission and constituency. Any additional resources, if required, should come from separate appropriations..." — Notice the qualifying words "intended" and "should?" This part is key to whether you think a separate honors college will eventually siphon funds away from UMass. Despite every assurance that the honors college funding will be independent, reality doesn't work that way. Reality involves the world view of people who make decisions. The social agenda described in the Bell Curve is already being implemented nation-wide. It goes like this: "Some people are a simply lost cause. Therefore, we must reallocate resources so that only important, productive, and worthy people benefit."
- The college will "promote social justice and service learning by requiring that every student be involved in community service." — Aha! Here's one that even the "UMass Objectivist Club" would be opposed to. Nevertheless, I doubt "social justice" will play a significant role at an institution whose foundation is built on injustice, and where supporters don't understand the origins of injustice because they can't see where injustice even exists.

Debunking the myth of the militant Muslim

We are the self-appointed police of the world, the remaining titan from a war of propaganda and the threat of force. We vanquish tyranny and injustice in our eternal struggle for liberty and democracy, never looking in the mirror at our own tyrannical, capitalistic exploitations. We are the righteous, unconquered and unmatched.

Those who stand against us, or rather do not subordinate, become enemies of the American Way. These enemies are known as communists and terrorists. Their cultures and people are so different as to represent an evil force in the world, a force that hinders the progress of our people, and our dominance.

And so, with the deterioration of the Soviet regime we turn our guns and propaganda towards the Islamic civilization, Mongol hordes in Arabic cloaks.

An elaborate and enormous war machine (i.e. defense spending) is pointless without a target or enemy so it becomes primary that these terrorists be addressed. And how do we address them? Through various media inputs the words "militant" and "Muslim" are seen as one and the same. Muslims are stereotyped as people who wage holy wars in "their" God's name, people who despise the enlightened Euro-Christian world. A people whose culture, laws, and politics are so entirely different than ours must be evil, they must be against us.

The truth of the matter is that Islamic faith is a religion that preaches respect, peaceful coexistence, and recognition of all other religions. It holds the Jewish and Christian people as equals, as "People of the Book" and of the same God.

Jeffrey R. Yusah

It is not a religion that professes violence or superiority, rather like any other culture war has been a means for their economic and geographical growth.

When viewed objectively one can recognize the vast array of similarities all three of these religions have in common. To see Muslims in this light and not for the fictional war mongers that they have been turned into is understand that the myth is simply functional to our government. Take into account the power that the Middle East, Central Asia, and Northern Africa possess there arises the paranoia of the American government and the need to dehumanize and stereotype.

They are the foremost supplier of the world's oil. Strategically, its geographic relation to Europe is "dangerously" close and its equidistance from U.S. on both coasts is equally "frightening." It is a civilization that does not allow American industry and its controlling and exploitive elements into their midst. It remains strong and true to its own history and does not let a superpower dictate its future or people. Rather than perceive the culture with a rational mind and respect, their strength is viewed as resistance to Western superiority. They become our enemies because they do not tremble when we flex. They are isolated, so they must have something to hide. To fear the unknown has always been preferred than trying to understand it.

When an airplane crashes or a bomb goes off almost anywhere in the world who is suspected first? When any conflict arises in Israeli/Palestinian debate which side is almost automatically sided with and which side automatically ignored? When civil war broke out in Bosnia, and Muslim men, women, and children were massacred where were the World's Police then?

In this double standard of perception the ideals of the myth seem clearest. Muslims are the automatic scapegoat, the apparent enemy. When a Islamic nation is said to have in its possession a nuclear armament it is immediately suspected that it is for offensive purposes. At the same time, the U.S. harbors the world's largest supply of nuclear weapons, but they are just for defensive purposes. When our revolutionaries raised their arms in rebellion they were called patriots. When Muslim groups stand up to similar governmental injustice they are terrorists.

But let us not ignore the fact that there are terrorists in the Middle East, as their are in every country. (Would it be fair to use the KKK or the neo-Nazi skinheads as the representatives of American culture?) These radical groups, though much smaller and more marginalized than one suspects, do commit atrocities. Comparatively, the Islamic civilization and its nations are responsible for any violence by a radical group. To blame a religion for the actions of a small sect of its people is unintelligent.

The essence of myth of the militant Muslim is that it serves U.S. policy to dislike Islamic civilization. Having a nemesis justifies our duty as the World's police. It justifies defense spending. It justifies an enormously destructive war machine. But more than that it justifies stereotypes, racism, anti-Semitism, and the growth of ignorance.

Defining multiculturalism

Multiculturalism is a term with various definitions. For some, it defines the social fiber of the United States as a "melting pot," grouping those of minority cultures and the dominant culture together. More so, it is the supposed ideology of the U.S. as a land that embraces many cultures, a land that combines these cultures and heritages equally to form a new multicultural society and people.

Jeffrey R. yusah

Instead, through Americanization our histories are ignored. We learn about the saving grace of the European "discovery" of the Americas. We learn how Christianity would purge the savages of their primitive and pagan existences. We learn how white world supremacy brought civilization to this Earth. We learn how the lower class exists out of its own laziness and not from the lack institutional opportunity given to them. We learn that the American dream of material wealth is the chosen path and that everyone may achieve it.

We must then assimilate so that we do not become their stereotypes. We must forget the pain of the past and ignore the oppression and isolation today. We must forget that in a capitalist society there must be poverty, constant unemployment, and subjugated proletariats. And though they are our brothers and sisters we close our eyes to them and their plight. We become Americans, successful capitalists, and the envy of the world. But we are minorities with second class representation and status. To have the vision to see past the racism, institutionally and ideologically, your ignorance may convince you that the ideal of America is the reality of America. But my perception of the U.S. does not allow me accept this propaganda. Thankfully, I am not alone in my perceptions.

There are a few people who refuse to be ignorant, refuse to be uneducated, and refuse to subsist amongst the subsistence. They break their ideological ties to the mainstream American dogma. They leave their Eurocentric educations in their wake and strive to know more about their people and their culture. They realize the way they have been whitewashed and find comfort in their true identities. They begin to spread the word about what America is not and just as important what it is. They begin to see themselves as more than simply what this country manufactured and sold. Through the power of the word and through the wealth of education they begin their struggle for recognition, for equality. They wish to finally bring the American Revolution, the Emancipation Proclamation and the Civil Rights Movement to its conclusion, so that we may finally live the ideals that we preach. This fight is small, but everyday it gains support. Everyday that there is another abuse, the struggle gets recognition and strengthens its resistance. With this, we fortify and unite.

As a goal of the Multicultural Affairs Desk at the Collegian we wish to bring these voices to the forefront. To make sure that our stories are told, so that we are represented fairly. Adding fuel to the fire, we explain how the U.S. is oppressive on local, national and international levels.

This time around the revolution will not be televised.

Stone makes wrong turn in film

Flawless performance from Sean Penn cannot rescue U– turn

By Adam Levine
Collegian Staff

U–TURN
Directed by Oliver Stone
with Sean Penn, Nick Nolte, Jennifer Lopez
Playing at Hampshire Six Theaters

For over a decade, Oliver Stone has used the medium of film to further his elaborate causes. Whether it be anti–war epics, disruptive satire, historical revisions or political commentaries, Stone is relentless at having his face right up in front of your eyes. He has boldly attempted, time after time, to change the way we perceive our culture and society and to give us a sharp dose of his definition of the truth.

U–Turn, as a term in itself, is in essence the direction that Stone is taking for his own career. Perhaps tired of all his well–deserved criticism, Stone is doing the 180 degree shift, yet still staying true to short attention span editing and Natural Born Killers campish cinematography. However, this time around, Stone has nothing to say, no flashy messages or blunt statements. Not that a film maker shouldn't take a stand or attempt to prove a point by any means, but Stone has built a career of hypocrisy by forcing his opinions about not trusting anyone except, of course, himself.

Following from one cliché to the next, U–Turn is a story about all the bad things that could happen to one urban drifter when he's left helpless in the middle of nowhere. Sean Penn, still struggling for that big comeback, is flawless though confined to an implausible and often just ridiculous script. Penn is Bobby Cooper. (could they think of a more generic name?), an out of luck gambler clinging to a "rebel without a cause" style persona, as he cruises in his slick 64' red Mustang through the Arizona desert en route to Los Angeles.

When his car breaks down conveniently in front of a road sign with arrows pointing to different towns, Stone gets to play with all the popular Western and noir conventions. Cooper chooses to head for the town of Superior and embarks through the sleepy, backwards mining village as the quintessential man without a name, or history or anything. Stone is forced to heighten the intrigue with camera work that seems ripped off from an MTV buzz clip, hoping to keep your attention with quick cuts and grainy film stock.

Once in Superior, Stone introduces a bizarre array of characters who serve no purpose other than to give fuel to a strange film. Superior is the town that time forgot; a rustic dirty place filled with inbreeds and back stabbers and a whole lot of corruption and murder, not to mention a stereotypical native American, played by John Voight, who speaks like a fortune cookie. The worst is a random over– sexed teenager (Claire Danes) and her bullish over– protective ignorant boyfriend (Joaquin Phoenix). All these people including the femme fatale (Jennifer Lopez), her wealthy husband (Nick Nolte), and the creepy car mechanic (Billy Bob Thorton) all try to make poor Bobby's life miserable when all he wants is to get out of town and pay off the loan sharks who removed two of his fingers.

U–Turn may have been the rough draft for Orson Wells' Touch of Evil, but there just wasn't enough to work with. Stone has decided to work with it nonetheless, which essentially means working with nothing; a story which appears more like a rejected script from the more recent episodes of "The Twilight Zone."

Yet, the performances for the most part are decent despite the fact that their purpose of existence is confusing in itself. Stone has created nothing more than a mismatched collection of strange characters, combined with a silly premise. Perhaps he should go back to his old self, because after U–Turn he probably doesn't have a whole lot to lose. D

A look at the week's hardcore scene

Adam Dlugacz

I'm back from my one week hiatus and I know you all missed me so here's this week's column to rescue you from your hardcore doldrums.

The new H2O album comes out today. It's on Epitaph and it's called Thicker Than Water. I saw their record release party this weekend at the Tramps and it was off the hook. If you like fast, fun, melodic hardcore I suggest you run to Newbury Comics as soon as you finish this article.

Super emo boys Promise Ring are back with their second LP on Jade Tree. If you wear a knapsack, sway and clap your hands at shows, cry, or think about the opposite sex all the time, pick it up. The songs I heard were straight up pop, sweeter then a corn puff and sadder than Muddy Waters singing the blues. They're playing tonight with Piebald in Worcester.

Day In The Life just released its self–titled debut on Building Records. The band features George Reynolds on vocals and Josh DeMarco on guitar, both of Mind Over Matter fame. This album merges the attack and aggressiveness of modern hardcore with the intricacies and complex tempo shifts of Drive Like Jehu. The dual vocals, guitar work, and bass lines are phenomenal. The lyrics deal with the transitional period between ending school and entering the real world, a topic pertinent to all of us. They also share Fugazi's apocalyptic vision of the free–market economy, especially on songs like "Spin Control," "Self Serve" and "Sign of the Times." "Tenth in a Series" offers an excellent view on dating, with lyrics like "Here is one plan I can devise / to be right on top of it / tenth in a series of breakdowns, delusions, and stalls / here is one plan I can revise / to get back on top of it / it just needs to work one time / I look better from a distance so do you / everyone plans to look better then they do." Drive Like Jehu has put out a brilliant, mature album which will make you ponder life while you windmill.

For all you internet lovers, the new Jade Tree web page is almost done and it's going to resemble a '50s diner menu, so check it out.

Church wants "Nothing Sacred" gone

By Frazier Moore
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Sometimes the Lord works in mysterious ways. For instance, it was by his hand (some might contend) that ABC came to choose a splendid new drama, then forsake it in one of prime–time's most god–awful slots.

Thus has "Nothing Sacred," which airs Thursday at 8 p.m. EST, come to face a nothing–sacred powerhouse called "Friends."

Such opposition would try the faith of the staunchest believer, which, as it happens, is one of the issues "Nothing Sacred" wrestles with — a priest's crisis of faith — as Nielsen smites the series on a weekly basis.

The Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights condemns the series as "a political statement against the Catholic Church."

According to William Donohue, president of the 350,000–member organization, "We will settle for nothing less than the removal of this show from TV."

Although ABC continues to profess support for "Nothing Sacred" and to insist that its commercial time is sold out, several sponsors, apparently bowing to pressure from the Catholic League, have dropped out.

So if "Nothing Sacred" leaves the air in the next few months, as seems more likely than not, Donohue can be expected to take credit. Never mind that a recent airing of the series was the week's lowest–rated hour on the Big Four networks, with only one–quarter the audience of "Friends."

In short, even controversy has failed to draw viewers away from "Promised Land," "Living Single," and "Friends" with its sexy kaffeeklatsch. So far, "Nothing Sacred" has suffered less from audience outrage than from audience neglect.

Too bad. "Nothing Sacred" is worth a try, even for those who might tune in hoping for a taste of the Catholic League's forbidden fruit.

What they will find, instead, is a series that was co–created by a Jesuit priest who remains a producer.

And they will find a hero with feet of clay in Father Ray, the compassionate, sometimes hot–headed priest of a troubled inner–city parish. An all–man man of the cloth, Father Ray leads the needy flock of St. Thomas while fighting his own personal demons — doubt, temptation and world–weariness.

"Some people get scared when they see spiritual figures with flaws," concedes Kevin Anderson, who stars as Father Ray. "They find it threatening." He should know.

At 37, he has a distinguished resume that includes co–starring with Julia Roberts in the film hit Sleeping With the Enemy, and abundant stage performances, some as a member of the celebrated Steppenwolf Theatre Company.

Now cast in a theological skirmish along with his first television series, Anderson gently notes, "I'm not a Catholic priest. I just play one on TV."

On the other hand, he was raised a Catholic in his tiny hometown of Gurnee, Ill.

"The Catholic League is certainly not representative of the entire thinking of the Catholic Church," he observes, "just as we (St. Thomas) aren't representative of every Catholic church in America. This is about one parish."

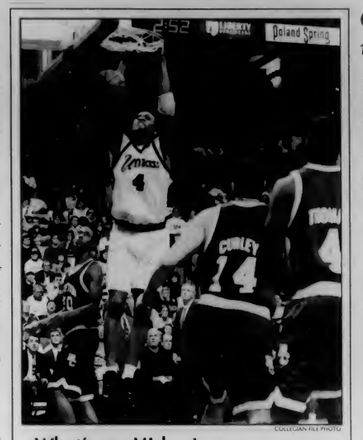
Thursday's visit with that parish is the most affecting yet. Rachel, St. Thomas' 18–year–old, unmarried receptionist, will decide whether or not to get an abortion.

But when she seeks guidance from Father Ray, he hands her this non–answer: "I told you what the church teaches, in the confessional, right? But what you do, that depends on your own conscience, and that's also what the church teaches."

Foes of "Nothing Sacred" will likely pluck such dialogue out of context to further their argument that "Nothing Sacred" aims "to put a positive spin on Catholic priests who prefer Hollywood's libertine vision of sexuality to the moral teachings of the church."

But that is not the episode's last word on the matter, either from Father Ray or from others who call him on this wishy–washiness.

Father Leo, an elder priest with a wry style and unshakable principles, represents the church's more traditional approach that "Nothing Sacred's" critics say is missing. And as played by the wonderful Brad Sullivan, Father Leo steals every scene he's in.



"If you're not gonna do your job," he explodes at Father Ray at a pivotal moment in Thursday's episode — "I will!"

Viewers who watch with an open mind may find not heresy, but a sober look at one of society's most indelible dividing lines.

"Our show doesn't really offer any easy answers to the complex questions," Anderson says. "Father Ray doesn't perform miracles.

He's not an angel. But true faith is when you can deal with fears and insecurities, and still move forward. That's what we're trying to create with this guy."

tal toughness to compliment is tennis skill. I am confident he will come around."

Aller fell 2–6, 3–6, but refused to quit.

"The coaches, have put their trust in me, so I'm going to play as hard as I can, to earn my spot," Aller said. "I'm much more comfortable playing at the no. 4 spot again."

Now that the Minutemen have proven they are still capable of winning under the gun, they have to turn it up another notch.

After scrimmaging at Amherst College tomorrow, they open up the home season against Boston College on Thursday.

The lineup appears set, assuming No.1 singles player Todd Cheney is set to go.

"I've been playing through pain, but I feel like I'll be ready to play this week," Cheney said. "I'll continue to play as long as I can help the team."

Aside from this, the only change in singles will be Manchester and Slyman switching back to their usual positions.

There is still one other point of uncertainty. Dixon has announced a challenge match for the No. 3 doubles spot.

Parsa Samii and Kevin Curley had been holding that responsibility without winning over the confidence of Dixon.

So this week, they will attempt to hold their jobs by playing Keith Scumann and Jason Lin.

The two challengers were walk–ons this season, and are eager to earn playing time. Coach Dixon said that Samii and Curley must win handily if they want to continue playing No. 3 doubles.

"After we settle this, we should be in place for the rest of the fall season," Dixon said. "Then we can back to concentrating on winning matches."

Cordero ordered not to leave town

CAMBRIDGE, Mass. — A judge yesterday refused to allow former Red Sox outfielder Wilfredo Cordero to travel to Puerto Rico before his trial begins Oct. 20 on charges of assaulting and threatening to kill his wife.

Cambridge District Judge Arthur Sherman denied Cordero's request without comment.

Cordero was arrested on June 11 after an early morning argument with his wife, Ana, that left her with bruises on her arms and neck, and a bloody nose. He was charged with assault and battery, assault and battery with a dangerous weapon, making a threat and violating a restraining order.

The 25–year–old outfielder was released after posting $200 bail and agreeing to several conditions, among them that he stay in town except for Red Sox road games. On Thursday, he asked that the conditions be amended so he could go to Puerto Rico and arrange to play for a winter league team he has played for in the past. Cordero's filing also said he needed to make arrangements for Ana Cordero, who is pregnant with the couple's second child, to live in Puerto Rico over the winter.

The Red Sox released Cordero minutes after the Red Sox season ended on Sept. 28, making him a free agent.

Ana Cordero has said she will not testify against her husband, but prosecutors say they have enough evidence without her. Cambridge District Judge Roanne Sragow is expected to rule this week on whether statements made by Wilfredo and Ana Cordero on the night he was arrested can be used as evidence.

Volleyball hosts Harvard Crimson in Cage

By Jamie Jee
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts volleyball team takes on Ivy League Champion Harvard tonight at the Curry Hicks Cage at 7 p.m.

The Minutewomen will play their first non-Atlantic 10 Conference match since playing the number one team in the nation, Penn State, on Sept. 13.

Volleyball
Massachusetts @ Harvard
Tonight, 7 p.m.

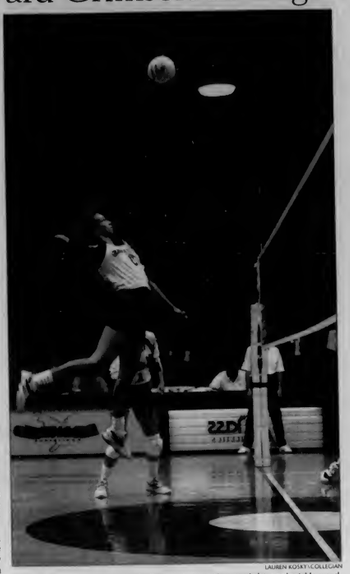
After starting 4-0 in conference play, UMass has dropped two in a row. Those losses came against defending A-10 champ Rhode Island last Tuesday and Virginia Tech Friday. UMass hopes to use this break from conference play to reorganize for a double dip this weekend against George Washington and Fordham, closing out their five-game home stand.

"We can't overlook Harvard," coach Bonnie Kenny said. "We still have to improve in a lot of areas."

After tonight's game, one team will have the all-time advantage as the all-time series is currently knotted at 3-3. The Minutewomen hope to duplicate last season's match versus Harvard, a 3-0 win.

UMass takes their 8-7 record into tonight's match along with a 4-2 conference record. They hope to spark their team play tonight and carry that into this weekend's matches.

The Minutewomen will work to decrease unforced errors and increase their hitting percentage as those factors plagued the team in both conference defeats.



The team will look toward sophomore outside hitter Kari Hogancamp, who's play has served as a refreshing constant. Hogancamp continues to lead the nation in digs, adding 46 in the last two games.

UMass hopes to increase the involvement of sophomore middle blocker Jill Meyers who is coming off a team- leading 19 kill effort against Virginia Tech. The sophomore connection is further solidified with outside hitter Sarah Watters. Watters has averaged 14 kills over the last two games. Combined with the fab freshman rotation of Courtney Bowen, Jennifer Drennan and Rebecca Hasson, the Minutewomen look promising. Playing throughout much of the team's march to the 15-12 win in game three against Virginia Tech, it may be the youth movement who gets UMass back on track.

Speaking of marches, senior middle blocker Michelle Paciorek has nearly come to the end of hers, on the way to unifying the all-time UMass career block assist record with her current career marks for total blocks and block solos. She is just one behind Dionne Nash's school-record of 263.

Freshman middle blocker Rebecca Hasson hopes to continue her extended play against Harvard tonight as her first real action came in the last game versus Virginia Tech. Hasson has been sidelined with a stress fracture but managed to get three kills, seven digs and two blocks Friday. Hasson brings added size to the net, something the Minutewomen will gladly welcome.

"Being the Ivy League Champs, Harvard is going to want to come in to our home and beat us," Kenny said. "We have George Washington Friday, but we can't take our non-conference opponents lightly."

Let's talk about Yankees and other relevant stuff

Fred Hurlbrink Jr. on Baseball

I got a call the other night from a polite, intelligent young man calmly suggesting that I discuss more prevalent topics than the Boston Red Sox, who failed to make the playoffs. Instead, this gentleman thought that it might behoove me to talk about a much more enjoyable topic like the playoff teams — things people really want to read.

Well, Spankee fans, here ya' go!

You want me to talk about the yanks...I can do that. Let's talk about Cecil Fielder. Boy, he got a lot of action in Games One and Two of the division series. Cecil, just the seeds, not the shells! The plump pinch hitter is makin' $7.2 million to put dents in the bench — good deal!

But, we all know George Steinbrenner is all about good investments. For example, Hideki Irabu was so impressive in his first two major league stints that he and his boat-load of yen are on the inactive roster for the playoffs and heading back to the mother land.

Hey Kenny Rogers, how's your ego doin'?

Well, I guess that's not really fair, since a lot of Georgey's investments do pan out. I mean, they have to since his minor league system hasn't.

Starting catcher, Joe Girardi (via Colorado). Best player and starting first baseman, Tino Martinez (via Seattle). Starting second baseman, Rey Sanchez (via Chicago). Third baseman, Wade Boggs and Charlie Hayes (via Boston and everywhere else). Starting left fielder, Tim Raines (via Chicago). Starting right fielder, Paul O'Neill (via Cincinnati). Starting designated hitter, Fielder (via Denny's...I mean, Detroit). Utility outfielder, Chad Curtis (via Cleveland). Pitchers David Cone and David Wells (see Hayes).

Yeah, they got Andy Pettitte and Bernie Williams and Derek (Pretty Boy) Jeter and Mariano Rivera through the Columbus express, but that's pretty minimal production for a team of the Yankees' supposed caliber.

Have I discussed them enough?

Nah.

By the time you read this, the Yanks will have at least tried to blow the division series — just like Sunday night. Hey, Nomar would have stopped that ball before it reached the outfield...Pretty Boy tried!

Let's just hope that the defending World Champs don't need Jeffrey Maier to bail them out again.

Okay, that's enough.

• Let it be said that there is no such thing anymore as "home field advantage."

Moises Alou is a Dominican who started his career in Montreal and now plays in Miami at Pro Player Stadium for Jim Leyland, who used to manage in Pittsburgh where Bobby Bonilla played in the Pirates heyday before he signed for the big bucks with the Mets and was then traded to the Baltimore Orioles and was a teammate of David Wells who signed with the Yankees, swapping places with Jimmy Key who used to pitch in Toronto just like David Cone who pitched briefly in his home state for the Royals who traded Michael Tucker to the Braves where he plays right field next to Kenny Lofton who launched his career in Cleveland with Albert Belle who now plays for the White Sox who spent so much money on Joey, they had to let Alex Fernandez go to the Marlins where Gary Sheffield plays right field even though when he was in Milwaukee with current Baltimore left fielder B.J. Surhoff, he said he would never move from his old shortstop position that Mike Bordick plays for the O's since coming over from Oakland where Harold Baines made a stop after playing in Texas where Kevin Brown spent the first few years of his career before pitching in Baltimore and now Florida which next faces Atlanta who traded away Marquis Grissom who used to play for the Expos next to Alou.

Did you get all that?

What's the point? The point is nobody stays with one team long enough to get familiar and truly comfortable in a ball park like Cal Ripken or establish a rapport with the fans like Mike Greenwell (nah). Players these days hardly ever get to the point where they learn the wall like Yaz or Greenwell or the nooks and crannies of right field like Dewey. Ted Williams played in Boston for 20 years.

Enough said.

UMass takes three at Princeton Invitational

By Fred Hurlbrink, Jr.
Collegian Staff

The No. 14 Massachusetts men's water polo team struggled all weekend to score goals, but the Minutemen still managed to win three-of-four games at the Princeton Invitational.

Brian Stahl, the Minutemen's top scoring threat, stalled out on the weekend, not scoring more than a pair of goals in any of the four games. More alarming than this abrupt drop off in scoring from the superstar junior was that he was shut out in two of the four games this past weekend.

Despite Stahl not being in his usual high-scoring mode, the Minutemen (13-4, 5-2 Collegiate Water Polo Association) were able to post a pair of one-goal victories on Saturday, beating Bucknell, 7-6 and George Washington, 6-5.

On Sunday, the Midshipmen of Navy got the better of UMass, 6-4, in a typical UMass-Navy battle; the Minutemen came right back and beat the host Princeton Tigers 6-2 to round out the tournament.

Bucknell scored all of their half-dozen points in the third period. UMass countered with a four-spot in the frame to knot the game at six going into the final period where the Minutemen defense put the game away with its third shutout quarter of the game.

Sophomore goal keeper Richard Huntley, who has shown marked improvement every match, stopped eight Bucknell shots to secure the win for UMass. Juniors Aldo Roman and Gabriel Marrero each had two goals in the match while senior co-captain J.C. Limardo had a goal and two assists.

The Minutemen's clash with the Colonials ended effectively in the third quarter — neither team found the back of the net in the final period. In that deciding frame, UMass outscored GW 2-1 to break a 4-4 halftime tie.

Marrero and Roman again picked up the slack for Stahl, netting two more goals each while the team's second-leading scorer Timmy Troupis (15 goals, one 2ptr., 18 assists) had three assists in the win.

Roman continues to be the strongest two-way player in the pool for the Minutemen. He is second on the team in goals with 28 — a distant second to Stahl's 40 goals and five 2 pointers. And he is second on the squad with 25 steals, one behind Marrero who has stepped up his defense remarkably this season.

Even though Stahl finally scored on Sunday, the day wasn't all that successful for the Minutemen. UMass took a 2-1 lead into halftime against Navy, but was outscored, 5-2, in the second half. The Midshipmen were undoubtedly looking for revenge after taking a 16-8 thumping from the Minutemen earlier this season.

Huntley had another eight saves for UMass, but his effort wasn't matched by the offense that got shut down by a vengefully physical Navy defense.

The Princeton defense held the Minutemen to two goals until the fourth quarter when UMass erupted for four goals to secure the much-needed victory over the Tigers.

Huntlet stopped 12 of 14 shots in the contest, capping a stellar weekend in which he posted 37 saves on 56 shots for an outstanding .661 save percentage.

UMass tennis undefeated

By Sanford Appell
Collegian Staff

In just one month, the Massachusetts' men's tennis team has encountered about as much adversity as they did all last season.

Last year, the Minutemen cruised to a 16-2 record without much controversy or injury. This past month, while undefeated at 3-0, the road has not been nearly as smooth.

Coach Judy Dixon has been forced to juggle her lineup, due to injury, loss of a player and other tennis related issues.

Now after picking up two major victories last week, Dixon is finally becoming more comfortable with the positioning of her lineup.

After waltzing by MIT on Wednesday, the Minutemen crushed Vermont on the road Friday afternoon.

The match score of 6-1 explains just how decisive the outcome was, though it did not look good from the outset.

Todd Cheney has been hurting as of late. Compounding that, were the flu symptoms No. 2 singles player Pat Slyman was battling.

This forced coach Dixon to insert Rob Manchester at No. 2, and pushed Slyman to No. 3.

Her decision paid off, as both players won their singles matches. In fact with the exception of Alex Aller, every singles player won their match at UVM.

The fact that Aller recently reinstated at No. 4, did not seriously alarm Dixon or Aller himself.

"Alex is continuing to play really tough tennis for us," Dixon said. Right now he just needs to work on his men-

Men's Cross Country finishes 21st at Shorter

Seth Koenig
Collegian Correspondent

The University of Massachusetts men's cross country team headed to Bethlehem, Pennsylvania on Saturday to take part in the Paul Short Invitational, at Lehigh University. The Minutemen came in 21st place out of 31 teams overall, scoring 605 points. The winning team, Michigan State, scored 52 points, followed closely by North Carolina, with 54.

Senior Ryan Carrara paced UMass again this weekend, as he had done in all of the previous three meets. The consistent runner came in 48th place with a time of 25:33.5, a solid performance with such a large field of competitors. Carrara placed second overall at the Vermont Invitational on September 20th with a time of 25:20, posing as his highest placing run of the season.

Sophomore Peter Gleason came in second among UMass competitors, but placed far from his senior teammate by running a 26:20.9 (111th place). Gleason, when present, had been holding the position of the number two runner on the team all season. His absence at the Vermont Invitational left a gap on the roster, but he has provided steady performances since.

Running third on the team was sophomore Kevin Somers. Somers' times and places had been varying early in the season, going from 18th to 11th in the first two meets. With a 123rd placed, 26:33.2 run at the Paul Short Invitational, he seems to have established himself as the No. 3 Massachusetts runner.

In the 156th overall place, senior Brian Chabot proved he could compete. In a season-opening tri-meet at Franklin Park in Boston against Iona and Northeastern, Chabot was nonexistent. However, his times fell as the weeks continued, and he managed a 16th place finish on Sept. 20. In the fourth position on the team in Pennsylvania this weekend, the senior put himself in good company.

The season's great question mark, freshman Brendon Sullivan, pulled in fifth on the Minutemen, placing 167th overall with a time of 27:20.1. At Franklin Park, Sullivan shocked opposition by placing ninth. He then dropped to 21st at Vermont. Since his strong 26:16 time to start the year, the freshman appears to have weakened, struggling to reach the 27 minute mark in the subsequent meets.

Coming up at the New England Championships at the familiar Franklin Park, the team hopes to overcome their slow start. The top five, along with freshman Thomas Stuart and sophomore Sean Murphy will try to step up to bring home an upset victory at the big upcoming meet.

Individual reports attack in Thatcher area to police

University of Massachusetts Police are investigating a report of an individual who was attacked early Sunday morning.

At approximately 4 a.m., an individual reported to Police that he was "walking in the area of Thatcher Way when he had an altercation with four individuals," said UMass Police Chief John Luippold.

The only description the victim provided of the alleged offenders said that they were "four Asian men," Luippold said.

According to police, the victim, who is not a UMass student, received a cut on his right ear, a bloody nose and a cut lip. He was treated at University Health Services.

The incident is under investigation.

Any students who have information should call the Public Safety Department at 545-2121.

On Monday night, police arrested Michael R. Marchand, 22, of 31 Hitching Post Rd. in Amherst, in Van Meter Residence Hall after public safety was alerted by student security that an individual who had entered the building was violating a trespassing order.

Marchand who was arrested on trespassing charges was later charged for being in violation of a restraining order Luippold said.

Hamas leader offers truce; peace negotiations resume

By Ibrahim Barzak
Associated Press

GAZA CITY, Gaza Strip — The newly released spiritual leader of Hamas — the militant Islamic group whose trademark is the suicide bomb — made a tentative truce offer yesterday, saying the group would halt such bombings if Israel stops "attacks against our civilians."

Sheik Ahmed Yassin's offer, cautiously welcomed by Israel, signaled a potential shift in his group's dedication to the destruction of Israel.

The blind, wheelchair-using cleric made his comments at his Gaza home, where he received Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat, who kissed the 61-year-old Hamas leader repeatedly.

COLLEGIAN FILE PHOTO

Yasser Arafat

Yassin's overture came as Israel and the Palestinians resumed peace negotiations yesterday after a seven-month hiatus. Lower-level committees met to discuss relatively minor issues, but U.S. envoy Dennis Ross said the new start meant both sides wanted "to see a new page turned."

The renewed peace talks and Yassin's triumphant return to Gaza after eight years in an Israeli jail have been all but overshadowed by scandal: an Israeli official confirmed yesterday that Israel received a cease-fire proposal from Hamas two days before Israel's botched assassination attempt on a Hamas leader in Jordan. That bungled hit two weeks ago has damaged relations with Jordan, Israel's staunchest ally in the Arab world, and forced Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to make concessions — including Yassin's release — that have undermined his get-tough stance toward terrorism. Netanyahu has been harshly criticized for approving the operation.

Ross held separate meetings yesterday with Netanyahu and Arafat following three-way talks Monday night with Israeli Foreign Minister David Levy and Arafat's deputy Mahmoud Abbas.

Israel radio and television reported that the U.S. envoy was trying to arrange a meeting last night between Netanyahu and Arafat, but those reports could not be confirmed.

Yassin, who returned to a hero's welcome in Gaza on Monday, said any halt to attacks would be conditioned on a full Israeli withdrawal from occupied lands.

David Bar-Illan, a senior aide to Netanyahu, called the terms unacceptable — but he said the fact that Yassin's overture was made at all represented "a positive change."

Yassin and other Hamas leaders are not endorsing the idea of a comprehensive peace settlement, saying only a limited cease-fire was possible after which fighting would resume.

In the past, Hamas leaders have spoken of a "holy war" to establish an Islamic state in all of what is now Israel. The group has carried out

Queen Elizabeth visits Pakistan

ISLAMABAD, Pakistan (AP) — On her first official visit to this former British colony in 36 years, Queen Elizabeth II praised Princess Diana's efforts to fight cancer in Pakistan.

She also thanked Pakistanis for their support after Diana's death.

"I pay tribute here to the work in Pakistan during the life of Diana, Princess of Wales," the queen said yesterday at a dinner hosted by Pakistan President Farooq Leghari. "It has been a source of comfort and strength to know that people around the world, including here, have shared our grief at Diana's tragic, early death."

The royal visit marks the 50th anniversary of Pakistan's independence from Britain. Created as a homeland for the Muslims of the Asian subcontinent, Pakistan was carved from a larger India when the British left.

Diana twice traveled to Pakistan to help raise money for a cancer hospital, founded by Pakistan's former cricket captain Imran Khan as a memorial to his mother, who died of the disease. Diana spent hours comforting some of the youngest patients at the hospital, which offers free treatment to thousands of Pakistan's poorest.

Gay Hispanics meet in Puerto Rico

SAN JUAN, Puerto Rico (AP) — Gay Hispanics are holding their first international congress in Puerto Rico, where legislators want to ban same-sex marriages and police are in court for attacking homosexuals.

Anti-abortion and religious groups gathered yesterday outside the Capitol to support the bill against homosexual matrimony — two days before the five-day congress starts.

About 1,000 delegates are coming from all over the Americas, but mostly from the United States. Manuel Ornelas Quintero, director of the Latino-Latina Lesbian and Gay Organization, said they chose the U.S. Caribbean commonwealth because it is "the door to the Americas."

"Violence against gays and lesbians is not unique to Puerto Rico," Ornelas said from the group's Washington headquarters. But local homosexuals argue that the island's religious bent and Latin tradition of gender roles make for a more hostile atmosphere. There is a police regulation against employing homosexuals and homosexual sex is a felony, punishable by 10 years in jail. Police responded with undisguised hostility to the last gay convention in Puerto Rico, two years ago.

At the time, the local homosexual community already was nervous after two transvestites were gunned down — allegedly by police. About 10 officers were charged, but the case was dropped for lack of evidence.

California term limits struck down

Brown feels vindicated by ruling, but has no plans to return

By Bob Egelko
Associated Press

SAN FRANCISCO — A federal appeals court struck down California's legislative term limits law yesterday, taking away a powerful boom that swept scores of long-time lawmakers out of office.

Now, many incumbents who were faced with packing up are instead thinking about re-election.

One of the most famous targets of the law — longtime Democratic Assembly Speaker and current San Francisco Mayor Willie Brown — said he feels vindicated even though he has no plans to return to the Legislature.

"After all these years, I was able to have a court say I was right: Term limits are unconstitutional," Brown said.

In a 2-1 ruling, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of appeals stopped short of deciding whether the 1990 term limits law violated the rights of voters to support their chosen candidate, or the rights of candidates to run for office. The court instead said the initiative failed to tell the public how severe the limitation was: a lifetime ban on seeking the same office.

The fact that the measure permanently barred a legislator from running for the office once that lawmaker reached the limit was not stated in the text of the initiative or in the official analysis sent to voters in the ballot pamphlet, the court said. It became clear only in a 1991 California Supreme Court ruling upholding the measure.

"The Constitution requires us to invalidate an initiative if it fails to provide adequate notice to the voters that it would severely burden the people's fundamental rights," said the majority opinion by Judge Stephen Reinhardt.

"In matters this important, the state simply must tell its citizens what they are voting on."

Deborah La Fetra, a lawyer for sponsors of the 1990 initiative, called the ruling "a slap in the face to California voters."

"The people knew full well they were voting for a lifetime ban," La Fetra said. She said she would ask the Supreme Court to block the ruling, which is scheduled to take effect in three weeks. Proposition 140, approved by 52 percent of the voters, limits California Assembly members to three two-year terms and state senators to two four-year terms. It led to a complete turnover in the leadership of both houses and drove many longtime legislators to run for other officers or return to private life.

Twenty-six current legislators, including Assembly Speaker Cruz Bustmmante and Senate President Pro Tem Bill Lockyer, both Democrats, will reach the end of their term limits next year. Others have already been ousted, including Brown, who was forced out in 1995 after three decades in the Legislature.

Joseph Remcho, a lawyer for two former legislators and one current legislator who challenged the initiative, said the ruling "sends a powerful message to those who are writing initiatives that they have to be straight with the voters."

A federal judge struck down the term limits earlier this year, saying the lifetime ban violated the rights of voters and candidates. But the effect of the ruling was held up pending the appeal. The filing deadline for the 1998 elections is next February.

Of the 21 states with term limit laws, seven, including California, have lifetime bans on future candidacies. Reinhardt said it was possible that such a ban would be justified by the state's right to control its own form of government — an issue the court did not decide — but in any event voters must be told what they are deciding.

Reinhardt was joined by Judge Betty Fletcher. In dissent, Judge Joseph Sneed said voters were adequately notified of the lifetime ban by opponents' arguments in the ballot pamphlet. He also said the measure was constitutional.

Six arrested in connection with high school rampage

By Sheila Hardwell
Associated Press

PEARL, Miss. — Six teen-agers were charged yesterday with murder conspiracy in connection with a rampage last week in which a 16-year-old allegedly stabbed his mother to death and fatally shot two schoolmates.

Police Chief Bill Slade would not say what role the students are alleged to have played in the killing spree.

"We are still conducting an investigation," he said. "That's all I can say."

The arrests began Monday night. The teen-agers — five of them students at Pearl High School, where the shooting rampage took place Oct. 1 — pleaded innocent and were jailed on $1 million bail each.

Among those arrested was 16-year-old Justin Sledge, a close friend of Luke Woodham, the teen-ager accused in the rampage. Last week, Sledge provided news organizations with what he said was a document written by Woodham, in which Woodham claimed to have planned the killings. Sledge said Woodham gave him the papers on the morning of the shooting.

Woodham had been picked on by other students, who called him a nerd and knocked his books out of his hands. In the letter provided by Sledge, he said: "I am not insane. I am angry. I killed because people like me are mistreated every day. I did this to show society push us and we will push back."

School Board attorney Skip Jernigan said the teen-agers "loosely referred to by themselves as 'the group.'"

Police say Woodham, distraught over a breakup with his girlfriend, walked into the crowded school before class, pulled a rifle from under his trench coat and opened fire. His former girlfriend and another girl were killed and seven students were wounded. Woodham was arrested as he tried to drive off.

U.S. to press China to stop selling nuclear technology

By Laura Myers
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Clinton administration should press China to stop selling any weapons to Iran before declaring the Chinese are cooperating on preventing the spread of nuclear arms, the chairman of a House committee said yesterday.

President Clinton hopes to certify at his Oct. 29 summit with Chinese President Jiang Zemin that China has stopped helping other nations, particularly Iran and Pakistan, develop nuclear weapons. Such a declaration would allow the U.S. nuclear industry to sell multibillion-dollar reactors to China. But many lawmakers want strict assurances China is no longer exporting nuclear technology that could be used militarily and that the communist nation isn't selling missiles or chemical and biological weapons.

"Our members need to know that China is engaging in responsible nonproliferation behavior across the board, including all weapons of mass destruction and conventional weapons," said Rep. Benjamin Gilman, (R-N.Y.), chairman of the House International Relations Committee.

Gilman suggested the U.S. government use the promise of certification on the nuclear issue as leverage to obtain pledges from China to stop exporting missile components and other weapons to Iran, which the State Department declares is a terrorist state. But Robert Gallucci, a former U.S. diplomat who negotiated the freeze of North Korea's nuclear weapons program, told Gilman's committee it would be unfair to put extra conditions on nuclear certification.

Post office makes third billion-dollar profit

By Randolphe E. Schmidt
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The final numbers aren't in yet, but it looks like another billion-dollar profit for the post office. "Preliminary figures show we achieved a third straight year with billion-dollar net income," Postmaster General Marvin Runyon told the agency's board of governors, meeting in Norman, Okla., yesterday.

Also yesterday, the post office said it delivered 92 percent of local first-class mail on time between mid-May and mid-September, a record-tying performance, despite the added volume of the United Parcel Service strike.

The national 92-percent on-time performance is 1 percentage point better than the same period a year earlier and ties the 92 percent on-time performance of the previous quarter.

"Clearly, this proves that we maintained quality first-class service during the United Parcel Service strike — even while delivering 9 billion pieces of mail during that time," Runyon said.

The new fiscal year began last week, and accountants are still completing the final tally for last year, so exact profit figures for the post office are not yet available, postal officials said.

Surpluses in 1995 and 1996 totaled $3.4 billion, allowing the Postal Service to reduce its outstanding debt from $6 billion to $2.7 billion.

Anticipating rising costs, the agency has applied for a 1-cent increase in the current 32-cent first-class stamp price, but that is not expected to take effect before next summer.

The post office's continuing profitability breaks a three-year cycle that had occurred in the past, with the post office making money in the year after a rate increase, breaking even the second year and then going into the red as costs increased, leading to another rate increase.

The agency's on-time peformance is measured by Price Waterhouse Co., which sends a half-million items each quarter and records their date of mailing and delivery.

middle of the game," said Gallucci, now dean of Georgetown University's School of Foreign Service.

Instead, Gallucci suggested U.S. certification could be a step toward gaining future agreements with China to halt all its weapons sales to Iran and other nations considered rogue states. The United States also could deny export licences for U.S. nuclear technology to China if evidence surfaces the nation has violated its nonproliferation pledge.

No current U.S. officials testified before the committee. The Clinton administration has said it has no evidence China has broken a renewed pledge of nuclear nonproliferation made in May 1996. U.S. officials also note the Chinese just issued export rules to prevent the spread of nuclear technology that could be diverted from peaceful to military uses.

Still, U.S. officials preparing for the Clinton-Jiang meeting insist no final decision has been made about whether to certify China. The administration is seeking guarantees that China will halt or suspend its nuclear cooperation with Iran and refuse to help Pakistan.

"A decision of this magnitude should not be driven by a desire of an administration to have a successful summit," Gilman cautioned.

Gilman warned that if the Clinton administration certifies China and lawmakers aren't satisfied the time is right, Congress would consider legislation to delay or place restrictions on U.S. nuclear sales.

Under a 1985 U.S.-China Nuclear Cooperation Agreement, the United States agreed to allow its nuclear industry to do business in China if the country agreed not to help other nations build the bomb. But Congress the next year required the president to first certify China was indeed complying.

Awards

Robert S. Porter, professor emeritus at the University of Massachusetts, has been named the winner of the 1998 Paul J. Flory Polymer Education Award.

Porter received a plaque and $2,000 from the Polymer Division of the American Chemical Society.

Porter retired in January after serving 30 years as a faculty member, ten of which were spent heading the Polymer Science and Engineering department.

Marivin D. Rausch, professor of chemistry at UMass, will receive a $50,000 grant as part of the Corporate Pattern Incentive Award from the Texas–Eastman division of the Eastman Chemical Company.

The award, which is the second the group has received in as many years, has been awarded to Rausch's research group for its work concerning various types of polyolefin catalysts.

The James Stewart Fellowship, which is given on a basis of strong academic achievement, has been awarded to Elizabeth A. Leslie, a graduate student in environmental health sciences.

After completing two terms, earning the highest grade point average, and demonstrating exemplary school service, graduate students Ian D. Trudman, environmental health sciences, and Rachel E. Williams, biostatistics/epidemiology, have received the 1997 Academic Achievement Award.

Terry A. Tattar, professor of microbiology at UMass, along with members of the North Eastern Regional Research Project #140, has been awarded the U.S. Secretary of Agriculture 1997 Group Achievement Honor Award for Excellence.

The award, which was given for establishing innovative and cooperative approaches to lead the effort to restore the American Chestnut to Eastern Forests, was made last summer.

New Positions

John P. Flavin, of Arlington, Texas, has agreed to serve as national chair for Campaign UMass.

As national chair of the campaign, Falvin will head the Campaign Cabinet, a volunteer group of 42 alumni and friends of the University charged with overseeing Campaign UMass and identifying, cultivating and soliciting major-gift prospects.

Flavin, who earned a bachelor's degree from the UMass School of Management in 1959, is currently chairman of the board of Triangle Supply Co., Inc., of Dallas.

Polymer science and engineering professor Thomas Russell has been named director of the Materials Research Science and Engineering Center (MRSEC) at UMass.

The MRSEC, which is the only center of this type in the nation, received a $7 million grant in 1994 from the National Science Foundation to support basic research in polymer science and engineering.

Seminars

Professors from the UMass School of Public Health and Health Sciences will be giving a series of free presentations to coaches, athletes and parents in the Amherst community titled, "Food for Sport: Achieving Peak Performance for Young Athletes." The Event will take place today from 7–9 p.m. in the VIP room at the Mullins Center.

Stella L. Volpe and Priscilla M. Clarkson, exercise science, will be joined by Robert E. Levine, nutrition, and Tom Rowland of the Baystate Medical Center.

"New Opportunities from Chemistry for Process Systems Engineering," was the focus of a seminar given by UMass professor of chemical engineering Michael Doherty at Imperial College, London, England last month.

The talk keynoted Imperial College's special series on "Future Directions in Process Design and Development."

Allocations

UMass has allocated $250,000 for two projects in its on- going partnership with the city of Springfield. Some $210,000 will provide additional will provide additional funding for the existing biomedical research program between UMass and the Baystate Medical Center. The other $40,000 will be used by UMass' Center for Economic Development to study how to attract biotechnology firms to Springfield.

more than a dozen suicide bombings in the Jewish state since 1994.

"We would like to hope that it means that he (Yassin) will preach peace rather than violence," Barlllan told The Associated Press. "There is no question he has a following and charisma." That following — demonstrated by a huge flag-waving welcome Monday — has not gone unnoticed by Arafat.

As Israel's prime partner in the peace process, Arafat wants to distance himself from Hamas' most hard-line positions, but does not want to alienate the group's supporters.

So the Palestinian leader has been treading a delicate line: he skipped the sheik's homecoming festivities Monday, but yesterday traveled to Gaza to meet him and give him effusive greetings. Although the Islamic group is calling on Arafat to release Hamas prisoners who have not been charged and to reopen closed Hamas institutions, Yassin said there was no competition between his movement and the Palestinian Authority.

"We are brothers — one people with the same aim," Yassin said. Arafat said Yassin's release would "strengthen our brotherly relations and Palestinian unity."

Deans of miseducation

As a recent graduate of the School of Education, I often reflect on Chancellor David Scott's words, spoken at the spring commencement. I was very pleased to hear that the University is moving forward and receiving the respect it deserves. As much pride as I have in these steps forward, I also have an equal sense of sadness about the current situation in the School of Education (SOE). In the 1997 US News and World Report for graduate schools, the SOE dropped from 36th place to not ranked in the top 50.

"I have thought about writing this editorial many times but have been hesitant to do so for fear of reprisals from the Deans."

David Raker

This is a stunning drop in prestige over a single year which obviously runs contrary to the overall positive track of most schools and departments at the University of Massachusetts. I strongly feel this drop can be attributed solely to the failed leadership of Dean Bailey Jackson and Associate Dean Jay Carey.

For five years I have watched these two consistently make choices based on personal preference with no regard to legitimate reasoning or a sense of equity. Further, in contrast to their outward expressions of social justice and democracy, reality suggests that their leadership is based on hostility and intimidation. This results in an climate of fear and a school no longer able to compete on a national level.

I have thought about writing this editorial many times but have been hesitant to do so for fear of reprisals from the Deans. Only now that I have completed my degree do I feel comfortable presenting my experiences and expressing my thoughts.

During the current restructuring of the SOE, several student-initiated meetings were held with the deans. One of these meetings stands out clearly and I think the actions of both Deans reflect their attitudes towards students. At this meeting, the Deans handed out their Strategic Plan (which none of us had seen before) and asked for our immediate input. Interestingly, neither Dean showed up with paper or pen to write down any comments we provided for further consideration.

In their plan, the only two programs to focus on graduate education at both the masters and doctoral level were those most associated with the Deans (Social Justice Education and Counseling Psychology). I commented on this and Dean Jackson yelled he is in no way associated with the Social Justice Program. Many students in the room, including myself, were stunned at the vehemence of his retort.

I feel that his reaction was inappropriate for two reasons. First, this outburst created an environment where students felt intimidated and at risk if they expressed opposing views. Second, he did not tell the truth. Dean Jackson is tenured in the Social Justice Program and would return to that program if he were no longer Dean.

At a meeting with Associate Dean Carey approximately one year ago, I asked why the Dean's policies appear to create obstacles to faculty and students progress. His reply was that I was paranoid. When I provided examples of these obstacles, he jumped up from his chair and told me in a very hostile voice to get out of his office. When I asked him why, he stated that my student status would not save me from outrageous comments. He told me to leave and not come back.

Those are the last words he has spoken to me and I am still unclear as to what he meant by that apparent threat. I have seen Dean Carey on a handful of occasions since this episode. In each instance, he has reacted as if I did not exist.

My point in detailing these experiences is not to draw attention to myself or to elicit sympathy. Rather, it is to provide some insights into the type of leadership in the SOE. It is to highlight the facts that these two Deans often treat students with disdain and that their explicit use of threats and intimidation have created a climate which suppresses freedom of expression. It is to present to the readers of this newspaper that the vision for the future executed by Dean Jackson and Associate Dean Carey has no basis in social justice.

Let me finish by stating that the SOE has some extremely strong faculty with a diversity of ideas that will help educators better prepare students for the next century. Under the current administration, many of these ideas are stifled solely because Deans Jackson and Carey do not agree with them. I only hope that the faculty and administration will do something about the leadership in the SOE so that diversity can once again flourish. Only then can the School of Education join the rest of University in its move forward.

David Raker is a UMass alum.

The sport of shopping

Today I would like to discuss an intrinsic part of our culture with you. I'm specifically referring to the sport of shopping.

Now some of you may beg to differ with me, saying that shopping is not a sport. In fact, some would argue shopping is akin to materialistic satisfaction.

Quick fix or not, shopping is one of those things people either love passionately or hate with equal ardor.

But rather than thinking of shopping as a quest to get things to add to your already cluttered life, take a moment and think of shopping as the sport it is.

I have compiled a list of a few events you might find taking place in a shopping mall on a daily basis.

Let's start off with something less than strenuous.

The Hurdle

Every sporting event has some kind of hurdle that has to be overcome in order to win. In hockey, you try to get past Patrick Roy or try to get the ball past Shawn Bradley in a basketball game.

In the mall, the main hurdle is the salespeople. Don't get me wrong, salespeople are really nice and they are only trying to do their job. Part of their job entails greeting the customer right seconds after the customer walks into the store.

Chances are, you walk into a store and a salesperson immediately jumps on you, asking if you need any help. At this point, you probably haven't even figured out what store you're in yet, never mind whether you need help.

The best move here is a polite "No thank you, I'm just looking" and keep moving.

The 100 Meter Dash

This event is better known as a "quick peek." Most people who participate in this particular form of shopping are mall veterans. They don't saunter anywhere, because they know what they want and they know that the Gap only has two pairs of socks left in their size.

You've got to watch out for these people. They powerwalk their way through the mall and are absolutely ruthless when it comes to the last neon green sweater on the rack. If you are in their way, they just may knock you right over.

And since these seasoned athletes know exactly what they want, they pretty much dash into the store and emerge 30 seconds later either victorious or ready to try their luck again, somewhere else.

The Meeting Place Marathon

Most everyone has taken part in this mall sport. It most often occurs with large groups of people — say about six or seven. None of you can agree where to go. Some want to check out the electronics at Radio Shack, others want to hit the toy store and some people just want to find the food court. It's at this point, you group everyone together according to similar interests and pick a place and a time to meet.

A key element to this event is making sure everyone knows where to meet. Just because you decide to meet at the Disney Store doesn't mean everyone will be able to find it. It's here where the run really begins.

Say you decided to meet at 8 p.m. At 7:59 p.m., you're still in the dressing room at Filene's, trying on 32 different pairs of pants. At 8:01, you and your friends are dashing throughout the mall looking for the Disney Store.

Seema Gangatirkar

And since malls are growing to the size of small cities these days, you may just find the Disney Store by 8:06 if you're lucky. But while you are dashing all over the mall, you got to admit you're getting a great workout.

The Food Court Shuffle

The food court at a mall is one of those things that sounds like a good idea at first and then you realize, after that burrito, it probably wasn't.

But when you're out shopping, remember you're exercising. So you get hungry, so you got [need?] to eat and, at the mall, you go to the food court.

At a food court, you have varying amount of grease products to choose from. However, indecision should not plague you on this portion. No matter what you eat, you're most probably going to feel horrible afterwards.

The Victory Lap

You get your victory lap when you emerge from store number 80, clutching a little plastic bag holding the perfect widget — or whatever you spent the last 10 hours looking for.

This is when life in the mall slows to a blissful pace and you are able to walk leisurely, with a silly little grin on your face and nod knowingly at everyone else around you who is just beginning the shopping mall decathlon.

Letters to the Editor

Frat bashing needs to stop

To the Editor:

I am writing in response to the article in Thursday's Collegian, about Chancellor Scott. You people can't stop using fraternities in your articles. Since the first day of school this semester you couldn't lay off fraternities. In your "Alphabet for Freshmen" you bashed us for the couches we have at our houses. These new freshmen already have stereotypes set on them by ignorant people and you (The Collegian) are adding to it. This makes it ever so harder to get new members. The negative attitude of fraternities must stop. A few bad and unfortunate examples makes all fraternities seem like they all do the same things. Why don't you write articles about the incidents in the dorms, like the indecent exposures, fights, etc. I'm talking about all the things in the police logs, write about that stuff. We are no longer about drinking and drugs. This image portrayed must stop. We are scholars, friends and renaissance men, yes I said scholars. All over the U.S. the fraternity GPA is constantly higher than the all men's average on most campuses. We do work for charities all the time. Many people choose to ignore the positive images now produced by fraternities and look upon the few drinking accidents. I feel a "Chapter of the Week" or "Fraternity Spotlight" should be in the Collegian to educate the campus about the positives of Greek Life. You owe it to us for your ignorant bashing of our old image. We are working hard to create a new positive image.

Fidel Castro discusses political reform in Cuba

Cuban President Fidel Castro explains his policies.

"Our problem was how to deal with the catastrophe that the disappearance of the Socialist Bloc and later the disintegration of the USSR, entailed for our economy.

"Our problem consisted of what to do to survive and at the same time save the major social gains the Revolution had made for the people.

"We saw it as a major challenge in which we first and foremost had to save the fatherland. If the Revolution were to be destroyed, the fatherland would be lost; the revolution and the gain of socialism was our primary concern when all those events took place, and abruptly at that.

"We had already been making political changes to improve our electoral system. It took a long time to explain the procedure used to elect the people's representatives. It is a new and revolutionary method.

"Originally, from 12,000 to 13,000 district delegates were elected nationwide. This is an approximate figure, since when I cite figures there may be variations. The district delegates made up the municipal assemblies and later elected the representatives to the National Assembly.

"Later on, we amended the Constitution and created the direct vote for the representatives to the National Assembly.

"This was implemented almost two years ago in the latest elections. Each of our deputies has to win one-half plus one of the valid votes cast in the elections.

"That was one of the first breakthroughs. We tried to make political changes with the idea of not dividing the people into factions. For us, the fundamental problem within the political concept was not to divide the people.

"We started with the concept that people nominate and the people elect. We established the assemblies to nominate candidates from the grass-roots level. Neighbors met and held discussions in public assemblies, as in the times of Athens one could say, to nominate the district candidates to form the base from which the other state branches were elected.

"With the new constitutional amendments, the district delegates — who in turn comprise the municipal assemblies — do not just elect but also nominate the candidates to the provincial assemblies and the National Assembly.

"We modified the Constitution to perfect our electoral system. In many countries there are many parties, society is divided, and the parties do the nominating and, often, do the electing because candidates are elected on the basis on how the candidate lists are prepared: number one, number two, number three, etc. In our country the multiparty system, as we could call it, is such that any citizen may nominate any person, and it is the assembly of neighbors who makes the decisions. This does not exist in other places.

"That is, our party does not nominate candidates. Our party seeks to comply with the electoral process. The people initiate the process and the people nominate the candidates. This should mean that the majority supports the existence of a revolutionary government.

"We, independent of other problems, have been thinking about all this because one of the characteristics of our revolution is that it is closely connected with all the people, and this should be known so that it may be understood.

"Our people are organized. Only an organized and patriotic people could resist 35 years of a U.S. blockade. Our children, women, neighbors, peasants, students, and workers are organized. These mass organizations represent 80 to 90 percent of the country's population.

"There has always been close contact between revolutionary power, the party, and the mass organizations. This explains our country's strength and its capability to resist the U.S. blockade, threats and aggressions for so many years.

"Other changes, reforms, and economic changes have enabled us to withstand the situation under the exceptional circumstances of a unipolar world, to survive, and to develop.

"The endeavor to go for it, alone, speaks of our people's high morale.

"In making economic changes we have considered what has happened in the Soviet Union and other countries that were divided, dismembered and destroyed."

This speech was taken from the Castro Speech Database.

The "Iranian Missile Crisis" and the art of warmongering

The "Iranian Missile Crisis," a manufactured travesty of international relations to which we have all been treated over the past few days, provides a crystalline example of not only how a well-oiled propaganda machine springs into action on cue, but also the way in which the government of Israel and its supporters attempt to control U.S. foreign policy in the Middle East.

The Warmongers Choir in concert

The directive was issued on Sept. 27, when Israeli Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai issued the first in a series of statements claiming that Iran was constructing medium-range missiles with some technical assistance from Russia. Maestro Mordechai hinted that if Iran developed a missile with the a range greater than an extremely modest 700 miles, Israel was considering an unprovoked attack on Iran similar to its 1981 attack on Iraq's Osirak nuclear reactor to prevent Iran from increasing its missile defenses.

Cough... tap, tap, tap ...

As the conductor flourished his baton in Tel Aviv, strictly on cue and in time a well-orchestrated chorus of hyenas in the American press began baying for blood. Mordechai and his top aides continue to provide direction with almost daily interviews and statements repeating the threats.

With singular predictability, the first soloist to howl for war was perhaps the most bloodthirsty journalist in the United States, William Safire. On Sept. 28, in his regular New York Times column, Safire described any attempt by Iran to build a missile with a range greater than 700 miles as a clear sign of Iran's "aggressive intentions." Safire was clear in promoting unprovoked military attack, by Israel and/or the United States against Iran, calling Iran's missile program "Iran's invitation to preempt."

Not to be outdone, The Washington Post, in an unsigned editorial on Sept. 30, repeated all the standard stereotypes and calumnies against Iran, and warned of the great danger in Iran acquiring any missiles with a range greater than 700 miles. The Post repeated Safire and Mordechai's threats of attack against Iran, again citing the Osirak precedent.

The Post threatened Iran with "dire crisis" if its military development continues, cryptically warning that "faced with Iranian chemical warheads, Israel would have to consider bringing its own nuclear deterrent into play." While this intentionally ambiguous but clearly threatening passage is obviously open to a number of interpretations, it is certainly possible to read it as authorizing Israel to nuke Iran if Iran can be shown to have merely developed chemically armed medium-range missiles. Fortisimo, indeed.

On Oct. 1, the Times chimed in with an unsigned editorial of its own, again charging that Iran's weapons programs, in general this time, among other supposed offenses including "disruptive diplomacy," "pose grave dangers not only to American interests but to the security and prosperity of Europe as well." Oddly enough, Europeans fail to grasp this.

On Oct. 2, Times columnist Thomas Friedman attempted a calmer analysis "before we go to war with Iran." While Friedman recognized that the situation was, in fact, more complicated than other members of the Choir had thus far suggested, nonetheless "the post-cold-war cocktail of weapons proliferation, religious extremism, rogue states and free markets is becoming the biggest threat to U.S. interests." In other words, the "Iranian Missile Crisis" is the deadly threat the Warmongers Choir has been claiming.

Hussein Ibish

On Oct. 3, the Choir achieved crescendo. In the Post, Stephen Rosenfeld, who purportedly authored the Sept. 30 editorial, again denounced Iran as a "miscreant state," and even blamed Iran for the 1996 Khobar Towers bombing, a thoroughly discredited charge cooked up by the Saudis to deflect attention from internal dissent and now repeated by the Warmonger's Choir to promote hatred of Iran.

The Times' Hyena-in-Chief, A.M. Rosenthal, again asserted that Israel is authorized by its displeasure to attack Iran for developing some basic missile defenses, asking why the Israelis don't destroy the "Iranian missile bases?" "They will, they will, as soon as Iran moves all its missiles into one neat base," he vows.

On Oct. 5, Choir Master Safire was back in action, now claiming that anyone doing business with Iran was "helping terrorists build missiles," and claiming that any population within Iranian missile range was being "held hostage."

The intensive warmongering campaign in the most influential U.S. newspapers by these Zionist ideologues, transparently operating in concert and at the direction of the Israeli government, can be expected to continue in the coming days.

Needless to say, neither Safire nor any of the other journalists in the warmongers choir detect any signal of "aggressive intentions" in Israel's massive long and medium-range missile arsenals or vast nuclear and chemical weapons stockpiles.

Nor do they locate any "aggressively" behind the permanent placement by the United States of over 20,000 troops, thousands of missiles of all ranges, the entire fifth fleet led by an aircraft carrier and its complement of over 20 supporting warship, hundreds of fighter/bomber aircraft, and almost certainly at least two nuclear submarines, all introduced to the Persian Gulf region following the Gulf War.

Nor do they acknowledge the scores, if not hundreds of billions of dollars worth of high-tech weaponry that U.S. arms merchants are forbing-off on assorted American dependencies in the Persian Gulf like Saudi Arabia and Kuwait. Were these basic facts to be recognized, it would quite simply be impossible to continue to suggest that there is a military build-up in the region driven by Iran, rather than by the avowed enemies of Iran, or that anyone, let alone Israel, is seriously threatened by an entirely modest Iranian missile defense program.

The "Iran Missile Crisis" obviously has no existence beyond the hysterical media event that has been created and staged in the major newspapers of this nation by the Israeli government and its prominent journalistic devotees. As such it is an extraordinary case study in the mechanics of one of the world's greatest propaganda machines, and a textbook in the art of warmongering.

Behind the scenes

The reason behind this symphony of vitriol and hostility is the fear among Israel and its supporters that the long– standing U.S. policy of "dual containment" against both Iraq and Iran, which has been moribund, was about to finally expire.

Recall that according to American diplomatic jargon, ever since George Kenan explained the post–World War Two policy towards the Soviet Union, "containment" is a euphemism for cold war.

The "dual containment" policy in the Persian Gulf was established after the Gulf War by pro-Israel lobbyist and AIPAC ideologue Martyn Indyk, an Australian who served as Clinton's National Security Advisor on Near East Affairs, then as U.S. Ambassador to Israel, and is now poised to become Assistant Secretary of State for Near East and South Asian Affairs.

Indyk's policy sought to advance the interests of Israel by formalizing and codifying openly hostile relations between the U.S. and its regional rivals, Iraq and Iran.

In Iraq, containment has been at best a partial success, since it was designed to create conditions which would lead to the overthrow of the Saddam Hussein government by creating untenable amounts of misery among the Iraqi people. In spite of the genocidal brutality of the sanctions regime, numerous terrorist actions against Iraq, and several bizarre CIA plots against it, the Saddam regime remains firmly in place in Baghdad.

On the other hand, well over a million Iraqis, most of them children, have been killed as a direct result of the genocidal American sanctions. Apparently, such mass murder of children is all in a day's work for the United States Secretary of State Madeline Albright blandly explained when asked to defend the deaths of over half a million Iraqi children, "we think it's worth it." Perhaps. If nothing else, this mountain of dead children is counted as a "success" by the Clintonites and certainly Iraq remains weak and isolated.

In Iran, however, the failure of containment to damage Iran or change its independent attitude is absolute.

This fact has become increasingly clear to many American policy makers and opinion leaders, resulting in a serious questioning of the policy. No other nation has joined the U.S. in applying economic sanctions against Iran, which just announced a $7.5 billion trade surplus for the last fiscal year.

Far from retreating into isolation or developing a siege mentality in the face of total U.S. hostility, Iran has held one of the most hotly contested and democratic elections in recent Middle Eastern history, where there was far more distance between the candidates than could be found between Clinton and Bush. Mohammad Khatami, who openly challenged the ruling authorities, was elected with a broad mandate for developing the Islamic revolution, and has quickly set to work reforming the key Ministry of Culture and appointed a number of women to senior government posts for the first time in many years.

A fantastic series of diplomatic successes, especially since the election of the extremist Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, and even more since Khatemi's election, has been enjoyed by Iran. Not only has Iran cemented its good relations with Syria, Russia, China, India and other important states, it has made substantial progress in broadening ties to Gulf nations such as Saudi Arabia and old enemies like Iraq, as well as the EU.

Most importantly, a series of crucial trade successes for Iran with nations who are otherwise supposed to obey U.S. dictates have exposed containment as a mere Washington fantasy. One year ago, for example, Turkey signed a $25 billion–plus deal to buy oil from Iran.

Another serious blow to cold war against Iran has been the increasing interest of U.S. oil companies in participating in the coming exploitation of the trillions of dollars worth of oil reserves in the central Asia and Caspian Sea regions. Both diplomatically and, above all because pipelines to transport this oil must flow through Iran, this has encouraged the oil companies to begin lobbying against the containment sanctions.

In July, the Clinton administration was forced to concede that it would not prevent U.S. companies from participating in the construction of a major 2,000 mile pipeline from Trukmenistan to Turkey, most of which will run through Iran. Clinton's argument that the pipeline is not an Iranian investment as such was widely recognized as a rationalization.

Throughout the summer, influential voices in the United States grew increasingly loud, pointing out that the sanctions and other cold war policies against Iran had failed miserably in their stated aims and had only succeeded in isolating the United States rather than Iran.

In recent weeks, however, the potentially fatal blow to dual containment was struck by the $2 billion oil contract signed by French multinational Total and Iran.

Not only was this a triumph of Iranian diplomacy and repudiation of American anti–Iranian agitation, as one Iranian diplomat called it, "a moral victory against the United States." This meant that France was calling the American bluff.

The so–called D'Amato law, which is utterly illegal under existing treaties, the world trade organization's rules, and the whole basis of international law, seeks to empower the United States to punish foreign companies for doing business in Iran and Libya. This and a similar law against Cuba have never been applied by the United States. The Total/Iran deal is so large and important that if the U.S. ignores it, it will be clear that such "laws" are only rhetorical and can be ignored with impunity.

On the other hand, the EU has made it perfectly clear that it will not accept that the United States can make laws that apply to their own companies' activities around the world. If so, as the French Prime Minister pointed out, France could no longer be described as an independent nation.

Thus the tattered remnants of the self–defeating "containment" policy against Iran gets plitted against a potential U.S./EU trade war, which nobody wants.

All signs indicate clearly that "dual containment's" time has come and that even the United States has come to see how completely without merit it has proved to be.

It is in this context that the Warmonger's Choir, under Israeli direction, began its hysterical scream, because for Israel, dual containment continues to be a necessary reality.

The Israelis are determined to remain the sole effective military power in the Middle East. Technological development, especially the development of military technology, even Iran's modest missile program, fills them with angst and hostility. The ideal Israeli solution to potential rivals such as Iran is the fate of Iraq, bombed to smithereens and smothered with sanctions. It is no coincidence that many of the current members of the Warmongers Choir were calling for a U.S. and/or Israeli attack on Iraq in the months before Iraq's invasion of Kuwait provided the pretext for the devastation of Iraq.

To prevent the devclopment of Iran, Israel seeks to do its best to promote U.S. hostility towards Iran, in hopes of ultimately provoking a U.S. attack on Iran, or at least ensuring enthusiastic U.S. support for an Israeli attack.

Therefore the motivation behind the warmongering isn't the absurd suggestion that anyone is seriously threatened if Iran develops missiles with a greater than 700 mile range.

Rather it is an attempt to ensure that "dual containment" continues because it provides Israel with what it wants, and in spite of the increasingly evidence that it is highly damaging to American interests. This is revealed, among other ways, by the blatant timing of Mordechai's directive to his American minions to begin to agitate just a few days after the Total deal was announced, and the obvious orchestration of a fictive media event conjured out of thin air: the "Iranian Missile Crisis."

Any normal government would acknowledge the uselessness of such a self–defeating policy, especially under intense domestic and international pressure to do so.

The Clinton Administration, however, continues to demonstrate that, on matters of Middle East policy, it in effect takes its instructions from Tel Aviv. The promotion of the author of dual containment, Martin Indyk, to Assistant Secretary of State level, and the domination by passionate supporters of Israel of relevant U.S. policy making positions, suggests that against every shred of reason American policy on Iran will continue to promote the interests of Israel over that of the United States. The Warmongers Choir, AIPAC and the others are in place to see that it does.

But clearly, it is high time that the United States ends its self–defeating cold–war madness, and deal responsibly with Iran, if for no other reason than its own, obvious best interest.

KMFDM releases solid effort; Busta Rhymes tones down style

COURTESY KAREN MOSKOWITZ

Germany's explosive export KMFDM reclaim their position as the gurus of electronic noise with their latest release.

KMFDM
KMFDM (5 symbols)
Wax Trax!/TVT

KMFDM has never paid attention to tradition. They are not a band, or even a group in the traditional sense. Instead, they are a diverse and ever–changing collective of like–minded musicians who, under the guidance of Sascha Konietzko, have done more for the advancement of electronic music in the last decade than anyone, save for Al Jourgensen or Moby perhaps.

KMFDM's ninth and latest album (Wax Trax!/TVT) — with a title of five untranslatable symbols — is a determined move away from the guitar–heavy soundscapes favored on last year's excellent Xtort.

Once again, Konietzko has recruited top–notch talent to help fill out the lineup. Skinny Puppy's Ogre, ex–Ministry/Revolting Cocks drummer William Rieflin and Beck/Elastica bassist Abby Travis have entered the fray, and longtime collaborator's En Esch and Raymond Watts (a.k.a. Pig) return in expanded roles.

The opening "Megalomaniac" features Konietzko and Esch's dueling vocals (the former in English and the latter in German) — a theme taken a step further on "Leid Und Elend" which is sung exclusively in German. The standout track though is clearly "Anarchy," a tune that encapsulates all of KMFDM's signature traits (raging lyrics, anthemic choruses and thick, heavy beats) in one brilliant singular burst.

Not quite techno, not quite industrial, but always thought– provoking in their never–ending campaign against "the system," KMFDM (5 symbols) is another solid effort chock– full of uncompromising and political songs delivered with their hilariously self–effacing sense of humor that helps soften the corners on Konietzko's sharp wit.

Does the new album explore any unchartered territory? Not really. Still, Konietzko hasn't thrown the Mercedes– Benz of machine–generated music into neutral to coast down the Gravity Kills highway of mindless garbage. Proof positive of German engineering at its finest. A– (Marty Keane)

BUSTA RHYMES
When Disaster Strikes
Elektra

Poor Busta Rhymes. No matter how hard he tries, he will always be remembered for his voice and presence rather then his mic skills.

Busta is trying really hard and while he does it pull it off most of the time he really doesn't have the ability to make it last over an entire album.

When Busta is just having fun like on the single, "Put Your Hands Where My Eyes Can See" he's off the hook but when he tries to flex on "So Hardcore" he sounds flatter then a Wheat Thin. It's that dichotomy that doesn't allow Busta to truly excel. When Disaster Strikes (Elektra) is a huge step up from The Coming but it's too uneven to keep your attention over 18 songs.

Busta has toned down his style a little bit and it really works on tracks like "The Whole World Lookin At Me" where the beats are bumping and he's not screaming down your throat. When Busta can balance himself out, he has the production on this album to excel.

The surprise gem is "One" which features Erykah Badu. A song about women and men having relationships based on respect showcases Busta at his best and if he knows whet's up it should be the next single.

It's also guest appearances that drag this album down. Rampage couldn't deliver on his own album and here you have to wonder if Busta is carrying him only because their cousins. Sadly enough Lord Have Mercy and the rest of the Flip Mode squad are even worse then Rampage and only serve to make you wonder why they are rapping on an album and you aren't.

If Busta would get rid of the Flip Mode Squad, balance himself out a bit, and stick to keeping the party hopping he'll have a great career. If he doesn't, at least he'll always be remembered as the crazy MC in "Scenario." B– (Adam Dlugacz)

VANESSA–MAE
Classical Album II — China Girl
EMI

Move over Mozart, Vanessa–Mae is on the prowl. Hot on the success of her debut album, Classical Album I (which sold more than 500,000 copies in a mere two weeks), comes Classical Album II — China Girl (EMI).

The 17–year old is at her best here as she strings her way to the top with music that takes the listener on a journey not easily forgotten. Not your average elevator music, Vanessa–Mae combines techno–acoustic violin sounds with jazz and pop in a mix that mesmerizes through her unbelievable ability to cast her musical spell.

Classical Album II — China Girl includes three pieces of music, which makes for a full hour of relaxation and pure enjoyment — as well as an excellent reading companion. Make it part of your music collection, you won't be disappointed. A (Lauryn Di Benedetto)

HELIUM
The Magic City
Matador

Helium's new release is titled The Magic City (Matador), and that's pretty much what it is — magic. Lead singer Mary Timony's wispy, yet somewhat throaty voice, coupled with dynamic lyrics and instrumentation, make the band's fourth effort a strong and impressive one.

Not to be outdone by the acclaim of their first full–length album, The Dirt of Luck, Helium uses nearly everything within reach to create a sound unlike any other. Songs like the instrumental "Medieval People" and the riveting "Revolution of Hearts" take pianos, violins, keyboards and bombs and somehow mixes them together in a way that is nothing less than amazing.

The Magic City contains something for everyone — its slow ballads are equally represented by hard–hitting melodies that leave quite an impact. The edgy "Leon" incorporates Shawn Devlin's powerful drumming and Ash Bowie's serious bass along with Timony's signature voice and grating guitar rhythms to produce a unique and soothing sound that rocks at the same time.

From the very first notes of The Magic City, you are entrapped and transported to a world of unicorns, rainbows and of course, magic. B+ (Alexandria Lipka)

SUGAR RAY
Floored
Lava/Atlantic

Even though Sugar Ray is a band completely devoid any any merit whatsoever, they have still managed to accomplish one worthwhile thing in their 14 minutes and 59 seconds of fame. They have somehow dethroned Third Eye Blind as the alternaloser's of the moment on the success of Floored (Lava/Atlantic), featuring the generic hip–hop/rock hybrid "Fly" — a song that has dominated AOR radio for the last two months.

Alas, glancing at this week's Billboard, I see that Smash Mouth's "Walkin' On the Sun" has overtaken our conquering heroes on the AOR top spot. Time's up, I guess... Let's see how many people remember them when they open for 311 at the Mullins Center next month. F (M.K.)

FOOL'S PROGRESS
Fool's Progress
Capricorn

On their self–titled debut, Fool's Progress (formerly Acoustic Junction) offer a refreshing selection of passionate and personal songs. Running the gamut from sorrowful tales of a recent breakup to upbeat descriptions of life in New York, Fool's Progress offer an honest slice of day–to–day existence.

While employing the rock band formula of guitar/bass/drums, they also stray into folk territory by occasionally bringing in an organ, violin and harmonica into the mix. However, while their instrumentation may sometimes be folksy, Fool's Progress' compositions are emotionally intense. On "Think About It," singer Reed Foehl recounts an especially painful breakup — one in which neither person is to blame, things have just changed.

While Fool's Progress will probably never bust into the Top 40, it's still an excellent piece of work. Anyone who likes the soulful pop sounds of The Dave Matthews Band or Natalie Merchant will certainly enjoy Fool's Progress' blend of intense emotion and simple sense of fun. B (Gerrit DeYoung)

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — Take care that you characterize others accurately today, or you may find that you are portrayed rather unromantically on the grapevine.

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — This is a good day for you to prove yourself in some way — though not so much to others. It is time for you to believe in yourself!

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You must be sure to support someone else freely today, without being seen as a corrupting influence. Be sensitive, careful.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — Others may be surprised by the depth you display today in a situation which others may take very lightly. Not everything is a joke to you!

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You may be looking for the wrong kind of outlet, which explains why it is so difficult for you to find. Trust that the right thing will come along.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — So far, so good — or so the experts are telling you, at any rate. You have the feeling, however, that you can do a little better.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — You may find yourself wishing you were somewhere else today. Why not stray a little from your current path? Real risks are few.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — You must make a quick decision at some point today that is likely to affect more people than you can count. Trust your instincts!

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — On no account should you allow yourself to get mixed up in someone else's personal affairs today. Danger certainly lurks there!

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — No one knows as well as you just where you are headed, and yet you may feel a little bit lost today. Do not panic; this is temporary!

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — Today, ease into something that will grow in complexity and difficulty. Pace yourself, and be sure to save energy for the most critical moments.

TV land hell; Uncle Bill on Capital Hill

Iowa went into Ohio St. this past weekend and was like, "Oh, yeah. We're Iowa. We have to choke."

And so they did.

So out of the cornfields of Iowa, stories of running backs with legs of steel and flaxen hair, 50-point blowouts and hopes of Orange Bowl glory fall by the wayside at the hands of the mighty Buckeyes. Just like they always do.

So now the focus is in State College, Pa. this weekend. That's where the fired-up Buckeyes are on Saturday to face Penn St. — every poll-haters No. 1.

Given my feelings on the Big Ten (remember last week? I said any team that beats two Top 10 teams and is undefeated and on top of the Big Ten should be No. 1).

Luke Meredith on College Football

this game — to me — should be the battle for the top spot in the polls. Florida is a great team, but that's how I feel.

Speaking of Florida, they'll romp in Baton Rouge, where a jacked-up LSU team will be no match for the sheer talent of the Gators.

Booty Schwag of the Week Award...

The fine gentlemen at ABC get the honored Booty Schwag this week.

Check this out. I'm in Methuen, getting things ready for P.J.'s (my dad) 50th birthday blowout surprise party extravaganza. I have a few hours in the afternoon to kill, and I had made sure I could catch at least the first half of the Iowa-OSU game. And what happens?

Both ABC stations that you can pick up in the Merrimack Valley (a media hotbed, to be sure) are showing the Notre Dame-Stanford game.

Let's review. Okay. Notre Dame sucks. Stanford, despite its status as matriculation grounds for Chelsea Clinton, is a lower-level Top 25 squad, destined for a slot in a bowl sponsored by a lawn care company. Plus, college football is best enjoyed when you can see a game where they have 100,00 wackos screaming for their school.

The atmosphere at the Stanford game was yawn-tastic.

Iowa is steamrolling. Ohio St. is, well, Ohio St.

I would just like TV Land (that's what bitter people like me call television) to know people don't care so much about Notre Dame that you can put them on TV, over a game with two Top 10 teams, and get ratings.

I don't care about Notre Dame, because they suck. If they didn't suck, I'd watch them. But they do, so I don't.

(P.S. Dear Mr. Keith Jackson. You're still wicked awesome).

Uncle Bill's line of the week...

My uncle Bill is 57 this week. (Yeah, Uncle Bill). He lives in Washington, D.C. and works at Delta Airlines. He's also a huge football fan. We were talking a little football when the following exchange enlightened us all.

Luke: "Ron Powlus is a poor man's Heath Shuler."

Uncle Bill: "And Heath Shuler is the worst quarterback I've ever seen in my life."

He then told me a joke about a dairy farmer and his secretary, but we won't get into that just yet.

Friends of the Program "Inside Tip" pick of the week (2-2)...

Okay, so Tennessee didn't cover. Look. I'm sorry.

And this week, I see no locks. So I'm going to an old friend who has won for me already. Clemson is a six point favorite at home against Virginia this week.

Virginia ain't too good. Give me the Tigers, and a little luck so I don't end up 2-9 when my little college football run ends for good in November.

Then you'll be giving me the "Booty Schwag."

UMass looking to bust up BU

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

After a pair of tough road losses, the Massachusetts field hockey team will try to even out its record tonight at Boston University. The Minutewomen will face the Terriers at 7 p.m. at Nickerson Field.

The game will give UMass (5-6, 2-0 Atlantic 10) the chance to put its record on an even keel. However, it will be a tough challenge, considering BU (5-4, 3-0 America East) is usually on similar footing as UMass. In fact, the all-time series record between the two schools is a close 9-6-1 in the Minutewomen's favor.

Another challenge for UMass will be how they bounce back off a road trip to North Carolina that saw the Minutewomen drop contests to the Tar Heels, 10-2, and Wake Forest, 4-1.

Junior Erica Johnston tallied one goal against UNC to increase her team-high goal total to 12. Freshman Sally Russo connected on just her first collegiate goal to finish UMass' scoring against the Tar Heels. Johnston leads the team in scoring as well, with 25 points.

Junior Vicky Browne, who was credited with an assist on Johnston's goal at North Carolina, sits second on the team with five goals and seven assists for 17 points. Sophomore Chris Millbauer scored UMass' only goal against the Demon Deacons to up her season total to four, which puts her third on the team in that category.

Defensively, despite past week-

UM face BC at AC; young Eagles in town

By Jim Eltringham
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts water polo team will put its 13-4 record on the line tonight, taking on Boston College at the Amherst College pool at 7 p.m. This will be the Minutemen's last home-away-from-home match of the season, and there are a few interesting aspects to this cross-state rivalry.

This match has something of a student vs. teacher subplot; Eagles coach G.T. Ladd is an alumnus of the UMass water polo program, and played under coach Russ Yarworth.

Also, along with a former Minuteman, BC boasts some players who were actually recruited by UMass, such as freshman Noah Lander.

The Eagles are fielding a young squad this year, and that should bode well for the UMass, but Yarworth is taking nothing for granted.

"They have a lot of good freshmen, they are much improved over last year," Yarworth said. "And they are still progressing."

Another possible problem for UMass may be BC's adrenaline and excitement. A confidence-building victory over Harvard — a problematic opponent for the Eagles in recent years — could have some spillover effect, while the level of competition may prompt BC to push themselves harder than usual.

"We're the four-time [Eastern] champs," Yarworth said. "So, teams always get psyched up to play us."

Along with being aware of the opponent's abilities and potential, Yarworth continues to emphasize the importance of constant self-improvement. Despite his team's successful record thus far, he continues to urge his players to strive for further progress.

For instance, Yarworth stresses the importance of defense-not only in tonight's match, but also in upcoming matches.

"We want to play a tough defense," Yarworth said. "Our offense has been sputtering of late, but if we play good defense, the offense will come around... and we want to play a total team defense.

"We'd like to be a little sharper with our ball control and ball movement. In our last two games we've had 14 shots, but we've also had fourteen turnovers."

Both contests were, incidentally, Minuteman victories.

Yarworth has voiced another concern, albeit a small one about home pool advantage, but above all else, he sings the praise of team unity.

"I'm always a little worried at home games — the players get very excited performing in front of their friends," Yarworth said. "I want to emphasize team play, because no single player can win a championship alone."

UMass looks for Ram-ming speed

By Jackie Laroux
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's soccer team is beginning to fully come together. The Minutemen have played beyond most people's expectations this season, with upset wins over No. 22 New Hampshire and No. 9 Boston University.

With a record of 7-2-1, UMass is ranked No. 22 in the nation, and No. 1 in the New England region. Senior forward Mike Butler has already been named a Atlantic 10 Player of the Week and freshman forward Seth Lilburn has been named A-10 Rookie of the Week.

UMass will put their recent improvements to the test today when they take on the Atlantic 10 rival Rhode Island today at 3:30 p.m. at Totman Field. Today's game is a must win situation for the Rams, and with a record of 4-8-0 (2-2-0 in the A-10), they need to get a win in order to stay alive in the conference.

"They are going to be coming at us," UMass coach Sam Koch said. "It's going to be a battle... it's always a battle with them, always a one point game. It's definitely one of the bigger games of our season."

The Minutemen, however, have a personal vendetta with the Rams. Last year, URI put an end to UMass' season, with a 1-0 win on Nov. 2. The loss dashed all hopes of the Minutemen advancing to the A-10 postseason tournament.

Rhode Island's attack will be led by senior forwards Brian Tucker, and Troy Robinson. Tucker is leading the team with nine points on two goals and one assist.

Last Sunday, the Minutemen put forth their best effort this year with a shutout of Temple University. With spectacular offensive play and a solid defense, UMass beat the then No. 19 Owls by a 4-0 score.

Koch felt it was the team's best showing this year.

"It was a 4-0 shellacking," Koch said. "Not even worrying about the score, we moved the ball well, we played very well as a team, and everyone was involved."

Improvement has been the name of the game for UMass. Their defense has gotten better although they are still looking to tighten things up — meanwhile, the offense of the Minutemen has exceeded even the expectations of Koch.

"We've been really impressed with the overall team play over the last couple of games," Koch said. "Offensively, I didn't expect us to be scoring, be creating as many chances, and having as many dangerous weapons as we have been.

"Defensively, we are getting better, but we still need to tighten things up, and cut down on the scoring opportunities we are allowing our opponents."

Problem with authority; UM looks to down Army

By Justin Rudd
Collegian Correspondent

The Massachusetts women's tennis team will be looking for their second consecutive win with a victory over Army today, with the Minutewomen coming into today's match-up with a rain-out at Colgate and a win at St. John's.

The two teams will be battling it out on the Upper Boyden Courts this afternoon at 2:30 p.m.

UMass defeated St. John's on Monday by a 6-1 score. Suffering just one defeat In singles play, the Minutewomen dominated the courts. When It came to doubles play, losing just one match, the women of UMass reiterated their singles play action.

The doubles teams of Jackie Braunstein/Robyn Lebovitz and Lana Gorodetskaya/Emily Wegner both defeated their opponents by a 8-6 score, and consequently, all four were double winners on the day for the Minutewomen. With the win, UMass improves to a 4-2 record on the season.

UMass should be approaching the Upper Boyden battlefield with the utmost in confidence today when they face Army. The Cadets are a squad loaded with underclassmen, and are led by captain Amanda Sentelle, the lone senior on a squad that features six sophomores.

Juniors Elizabeth Scherer, Khanh Diep and Melissa Kaiser round out the list of upperclassmen, who have stabilized this young Cadet team.

Army is coached by Illinois alum Major Paul Peck, who is in his third season as coach at West Point.

Minutewomen Notes: Freshman Robyn Lebovitz of Marietta, Ga. has made a substantial, and pleasantly surprising, impact for the Minutewomen this season. In the past five matches, Lebovitz has lost just one singles match, and two doubles matches.

Recently at the Eastern Championships in Princeton, N.J., the freshman advanced to the second round and, unfortunately, fell to an experienced Princeton native,

UMass' newly renovated auditoriums getting trashed

Autumn signals the end of re-runs on television. The Collegian has taken the work out of watching with a fall preview guide (see Arts & Living, page 5).

Faculty members are dismayed by the beverage bottles, candy wrappers and newspapers strewn about the newly renovated auditoriums on the University of Massachusetts campus.

At the last Faculty Senate Meeting on Sept. 25, a professor who teaches in Mahar Auditorium complained that the building, whose two-year, multi-million dollar renovation was completed at the start of this semester, is already suffering from spills and trash on the floor and professors who abuse the new, state of the art audio-visual equipment.

Similarly, Professor Walter Denny, who teaches art history in the newly renovated Thompson 104 auditorium, has complained that students are leaving their trash behind and professors are neglecting to take care of the new microphone system.

"One week into the semester, and the brand new carpet in Thompson 104 was already filthy and sticky," Denny said. "It is really heartbreaking to see."

A trip to both Mahar and Thompson 104 by the Massachusetts Daily Collegian this week found stains from beverage spills on the floor of both auditoriums, as well as empty cans, wrappers, papers and newspapers on the ground.

Both the professors and the students in the buildings seemed displeased with the conditions, although they offered different solutions to the problem.

Professor Katharine Vorwerk of the psychology department, said that she enjoys teaching in the renovated Mahar and hates to see trash on the ground.

"It disappoints me," Vorwerk said. "I wish that students were more responsible and felt some pride in the beauty of the room."

Vorwerk said she has asked her students not to leave their trash behind, and feels that is the best way to keep the building clean.

"I have spoken to my students about it several times, and I hope they are not responsible," Vorwerk said. "I think that reminding people periodically of the importance of keeping the room neat, and having larger receptacles for trash, will help."

Leslie Steiman, a senior German major who has two classes in Mahar, said she, too, is disappointed in how quickly trash and stains have built up in the auditorium, and thinks more custodial work is needed to maintain Mahar.

"It upsets me. I think there should be more janitorial work," Steinman said. "Some of it is just accidental, and the spills do not get cleaned up."

Jenny Spencer, president of the Faculty Union, also feels the main problem in keeping the rooms clean is the size of the custodial staff.

"The problems are really clear," Spencer said. "The people in the physical plant staff were cut so drastically, there is not enough staff to keep up the services."

Patrick Daly, an operations manager in the physical plant, said it is true that the custodial staff does not have time to do heavy-duty cleaning on a regular basis.

"With the custodial staff, we have to do academic buildings... things like shampooing the carpets have to be done at the end of every semester, because the janitors don't have time to do it every week," Daly said. "Heavy duty cleaning can not be done on a regular basis based on the current staffing level."

Final results confirm no winner in Serbia

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia (AP) — Serbia's recent presidential elections produced no clear winner, forcing election officials yesterday to call for another vote.

An extreme nationalist edged Slobodan Milosevic's neo-communist candidate in the weekend race, but turnout was so low a rerun must be held, final results confirmed yesterday.

Vojislav Seselj, whose paramilitary troops fought in support of rebel Serbs in Croatia and Bosnia, won 49.1 percent of the votes Sunday. Zoran Lilic, backed by Milosevic, the Yugoslav president, won 47.9 percent. The rest were invalid votes.

New elections must be held within two months because the 48.9 percent of the electorate that turned out was short of the minimum of just over 50 percent needed to make the results count.

Unlike Sunday's election, which was a runoff between the two men who did best in the first round Sept. 21, the rerun will be open to other candidates as well. If the winner does not get more than 50 percent of the vote, a runoff will be held.

It was the first major defeat suffered by Milosevic's Socialist party, which won the first multi-party voting in more than four decades in 1990 and all subsequent major elections.

Serial Killer executed; tied to four slayings

HUNTSVILLE, Texas (AP) — A serial killer tied to four mutilation slayings in Texas was executed yesterday after telling victims' relatives: "This to me is another killing and it's not going to solve nothing."

Ricky Lee Green, 36, was pronounced dead seven minutes after a dose of lethal drugs was released into his right arm.

In his final statement, Green thanked "the Lord above" and noted that he had been in prison for 8 1/2 years and caused no trouble.

"I feel I'm not a threat to society no more," he said, speaking quietly and slowly. "I feel my punishment is over and now my friends and family are being punished."

Turning to four relatives of his victims, who watched through a window a few feet away, Green said he was "really sorry, but this to me is another killing and it's not going to solve nothing." Green, a one-eyed radiator repairman, was condemned for the Dec. 27, 1986 death of Steven Fefferman, an advertising executive with Fort Worth television station KXAS.

Fefferman, 28, was castrated and repeatedly stabbed with a butcher knife at his home after he and Green had sex, according to testimony at Green's trial.

House approves abortion ban

By Darlene Superville
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Inviting another veto from President Clinton, Congress sent the White House a bill yesterday that would make it a crime for doctors to perform certain late-term abortions.

Clinton vetoed a similar bill last year. "The president's position has not changed," a spokesman for him said yesterday. The House passed the bill on 296-132 vote, more than two-thirds majority needed to override the anticipated vote. The Senate has passed the bill twice, but on neither occasion was there a two-thirds veto-proof majority among its 100 members.

Senate Majority Leader Trent Lott (R-Miss.) said yesterday he believed there was a "real opportunity" this year to overturn the veto.

But Rep. Charles Canady (R-Fla.), the chief sponsor, sounded a less optimistic note. "We face a battle in the Senate," he said after the vote.

House members repeated emotional but familiar arguments during two hours of debate. In the end, 217 Republicans joined 79 Democrats to approve the Senate-passed bill. Voting against it were 123 Democrats, eight Republicans and one independent. Six members did not vote.

Supporters of the ban said the procedure is "heinous," comparable to infanticide, and that there is no medically justifiable reason to use it.

Democrats countered that the Republican majority was hunting for a campaign issue and was playing politics with women's health. Others said the focus on one procedure wouldn't do anything to reduce abortions nationwide.

Student's blood alcohol level found to be above legal limit

Junior Adam G. Prentice's blood alcohol level was found to be above the 0.08 legal limit for drunk driving in Massachusetts, according to alcohol toxicology reports released yesterday.

UMass officials are still awaiting toxicology reports about whether Prentice was using drugs at the time of his death.

Luippold, who received the information from the state chief medical examiner, said the medical examiner would not release the exact amount due to policy.

Prentice, 21, of Hyannis, died of massive bleeding after he fell through the roof of a campus greenhouse during homecoming weekend.

His death is the third alcohol-related death on college campuses since the end of August.

A fraternity student at Louisiana State University and Massachusetts Institute of Technology freshman Scott Krueger both died from binge drinking.

Kruegar died on Sept. 29 after spending three days in an alcohol induced coma.

In light of Prentice's toxicology reports, University Chancellor David K. Scott has put an immediate ban on the consumption of alcohol during tailgating at football games, according to a press release issued yesterday from the University News Office.

An alcohol ban was in place from 1988-1992 for all tailgating events but was lifted on a trial basis five years ago.

Last Thursday, Scott said UMass would begin re- examining its alcohol policies after receiving many complaints about alcohol related behavior during Homecoming tailgating, plus the deaths of the MIT and LSU students.

Scott has named Associate Chancellor Susan Pearson to head a task force examining policies and solutions for alcohol use and abuse. He asked Pearson's task force to have recommendations about campus alcohol polices to him within six weeks.

"The use and abuse of alcohol is a problem on campuses throughout the country, and ours in no exception," Scott said. "With the new information that alcohol could have played a part in Adam Prentice's death, we must intensify our efforts to take all actions possible to ensure the safety and well-being of our students, faculty and staff."

Recent stock gains are 'unrealistic,' warns Fed

By Dave Skidmore
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Federal Reserve Chairman Alan Greenspan said yesterday the economy has been on an "unsustainable track," sending shivers through Wall Street. Stock prices slumped after his comments, though they regained some ground later.

In closely watched testimony before Congress, Greenspan said it would be "unrealistic" to expect stock market gains anywhere near those of the past two years.

And hinting of possibly higher interest rates, Greenspan said growing demand for scarce labor could drive up wages, and eventually consumer prices, and that risks short-circuiting the economy's 7 1/2-year-old expansion.

"A re-emergence of inflation is, without question, the greatest threat to sustaining what has been a balanced economic expansion virtually without parallel in recent decades," he told the House Budget Committee.

The stock market's most-watched barometer slumped in response, even though, as usual, the central bank chairman left vague the timing of any interest-rate increase aimed at cooling speculation on Wall Street and inflation pressures on Main Street.

The Dow Jones average shed 115 points immediately after Greenspan spoke. It closed down 83.25 points at 8,095.06. Bond prices plunged, too. The yield on the 30-year Treasury bond, considered a benchmark for mortgage rates, jumped from a 20-month low of 6.23 percent on Tuesday to 6.36 percent yesterday. The yield moves in the opposite direction from prices.

Though delivered in plainer language, Greenspan's latest warning provoked a somewhat milder response than his now-famous musing in December over "irrational exuberance" in the markets. His latest comment raises the specter of significantly smaller increases rather than a steep plunge in prices.

"It clearly would be unrealistic to look for a continuation of stock market gains of anything like the magnitude of those recorded in the past couple of years," he said.

The Dow average had soared 26 percent in 1996 and, before yesterday's pullback, it had risen 27 percent this year, just 1 percent short of the record high established Aug. 6.

"I'm sure he believes the market is overvalued, that there are speculative excesses developing," said economist Mark Zandi of Regional Financial Associates in West Chester, Pa. "He said that point-blank almost a year ago and got so much grief that now he's being a little more circumspect."

In his remarks, Greenspan analyzed what he sees as the most likely source of inflationary pressures: the labor market. "To be sure, job growth slowed significantly in August and September, but it did not slow

Daly said that the administration has increased the budget for custodial services for fiscal year 1998, and so there may be some improvement.

"Fiscal year 1998 has an increased custodial budget," Daly said. "They are trying to increase their efforts, and you may see somewhat of an improvement."

However, Daly said, with more and more classrooms scheduled for renovation on campus, the burden on the custodial staff will increase beyond their means.

"We are scheduled to spend $500,000 a year restoring classrooms," Daly said. "That works out to 15-20 classrooms and two auditoriums a year. It will put more and more of a burden of the custodial staff."

Daly said students will need to take more of a role in keeping the classrooms clean.

"The population using the classrooms could be a little nicer to them," Daly said. "We'd also like to see some effort on their part. Just pick up your trash — that will help."

Working toward a solution

Two professors on campus have begun to tackle the problem.

Denny, who also sits on the campus Classroom Improvement Society, has written a letter to all the professors who use Thompson 104 asking them to take better care of the audio visual equipment and to talk to their students about keeping food and drink out of the classroom.

"I sent a two page letter to all the faculty users of this room expressing dismay that there is crud all over the floor and that microphones are left on," Denny said. "If a professor doesn't turn a microphone off, or doesn't use the facilities with care, all this expense and all this trouble has been for nothing."

Denny has also personally asked students in his class not to bring any food or drink into Thompson 104.

"The other part is the student problem," Denny said. "People equate going to a lecture to watching TV. They bring food into the class and don't clean up their mess."

He is confident that if students and faculty work together, the problem can be solved.

"It is our own responsibility," Denny said. We can have clean classrooms. It can be fixed, but it has to come from the students and the faculty who are the University."

Sara Lennox, the vice president of the Faculty Union, is also working toward solving the problem by facilitating visits to classes in those auditoriums by custodial staff.

"The janitors will do a presentation to the students and help explain to them what is at stake," Lennox said. "It looks like it will definitely happen before the end of the semester."

Lennox said she hopes this will make a difference in students' actions.

"If it is presented to them as an effort we are all together in, I think it would make an impact," Lennox said.

New steps taken against terrorism

By George Gedda
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Hoping to dry up support for terrorism, Secretary of State Madeleine Albright took steps yesterday to block fund raising, freeze assets and punish U.S.-based backers of 30 foreign organizations she designated as terrorist groups.

The list included 13 Islamic organizations in the Middle East along with two Israeli groups. Also on the list were a number of Asian and Latin American groups.

Albright's action was in response to a 1996 law designed to stop fund raising in the United States by and on behalf of organizations that engage in or sponsor terrorist acts.

As of yesterday, any money that these organizations have in the United States will be blocked. Also, it will be a crime to provide money, weapons or other types of tangible support to any of the groups.

In addition, members and representatives of these organizations will be ineligible for U.S. visas and will be subject to exclusion from the United States.

"Our goal is to make the United States fully a 'no-support-for-terrorism' zone," Albright said in a statement. "By steadily reducing the habitat in which terrorism thrives, we can hope to make terrorists first an endangered species and ultimately an extinct one," she said.

In a statement issued during a political trip in New Jersey, President Clinton said, "The United States is committed to fight against those who speak the language of terror."

Two weeks ago, the House, impatient with the slow pace of designating terrorist groups, voted 396-6 to cut State Department salaries and expenses by 2 per cent until the list was completed. The law mandating the identification of terrorist groups took effect 17 months ago.

House and Senate conferees were due to take up the amendment in the coming days. Rep. Benjamin Gilman (R-N.Y.), the House International Relations Committee chairman, and others complained that the State Department was dragging its feet.

Yesterday, Gilman welcomed Albright's announcement.

"It's too bad that a certain amount of heat apparently was required to generate the necessary light in the State Department on this important matter of national security," he said.

Protest tells consumers of existing sweatshops

By Julie Siegal
Collegian Staff

A "Day of Action" was organized on Saturday at the Ingleside Mall in Holyoke to inform consumers and retailers of existing sweatshops located across the country.

Approximately 30 members of the Graduate Employee Organization (GEO), Undergraduate Employee Organization (UEO), Pioneer Valley Central Labor Council and students from the five-college area gathered outside the mall and on public roads leading to the mall to distribute leaflets and collect signatures for petitions going to President Clinton and Congress.

"We want to make sure Clinton tells the industry to clean up its act," said GEO member Jon Zerolnick.

A lot of people are familiar with past news coverage attributed to talk show host Kathie Lee Gifford for using sweatshops in producing her clothing line, but the existence of sweatshops in the U.S. is not getting the coverage it deserves, Zerolnick said.

"No one is for sweatshops," he said. "People just don't know they still exist and to what extent."

The mall "protesters" explained to consumers that certain products made by companies like Nike, Guess and Disney are being made in sweatshops, with the majority of money consumers spend on those products going to the people designing the clothes, not the people making them, Zerolnick said.

"We were clearly successful on that point," he said. "We let consumers know and they were really receptive."

Most people acted concerned and inquired about what they could do to help out, but negative feedback also accompanied the positive.

"One woman crumpled up a leaflet and threw it at my face and said, 'At least [shopping] gives the kids something to do,'" Zerolnick said.

The students distributed leaflets outside the mall from 12-1 p.m. before police officers stepped in and asked them to leave. They proceeded to the road leading to the mall where they received support from cars and passers-by, according to Zerolnick.

Although some students were banned from the mall for up to one year, Zerolnick said Saturday was the "epitome of a peaceful demonstration with no chanting or yelling."

Some students also entered certain stores before noon and hid leaflets inside pockets of jeans and other products made by companies who use sweatshops.

Zerolnick and the other "demonstrators" said they are satisfied with the outcome of Saturday's event.

"The only way to assess [the results] is by people's responses and they were outraged by what we had to say," Zerolnick said.

GEO and UEO will pick up where they left off and continue to circulate petitions around campus and set up tables in the Campus Center to involve the campus community in their battle against sweatshops.

enough," he said. "The performance of labor markets this year suggests the economy has been on an unsustainable track."

The unemployment rate, at 4.9 percent in September, is near a 24-year low. And, though some early retirees, homemakers and students presumably could be lured into the labor market, that might require pay increases, he said.

He conceded there's little evidence of wage acceleration so far, but warned, "to believe, however, that wage pressures will not intensify...strains credibility."

"The law of supply and demand has not been repealed," he said. "The question is surely when, not whether, labor costs will escalate more rapidly."

The central bank hasn't changed interest rates since March 25, when it raised its benchmark rate for overnight loans between banks a quarter point to 5.5 percent. It again voted to hold rates steady last week, but Greenspan left the clear impression the Fed was prepared to act if necessary.

"The markets, which had just shrugged off the possibility of any further Fed tightening, now has to look to the great probability of a tightening either at the next meeting on Nov. 12 or in December," said economist David Jones of Aubrey G. Lanston & Co. in New York.

Greenspan delivered his cautions about the possibility for economic and financial upset to lawmakers already debating plans for spending expected budget surpluses predicated on the economy and stock market continuing its stellar performance.

"I'm coming out"

For all of you who are excited because it is National Coming Out week, I urge you to blast in your cars, dorm rooms, houses and walkmans, the recent Biggie Smalls joint called "More Money, More Problems." If you notice, it samples Diana Ross. In the song, on top of bumpin' beats she sings very enthusiastically "I'm... coming... out." Listening to it, while your spirits join its transcending sound, brings forth a very liberating feeling.

It is important to come out (of the closet, as they say) for many reasons. First of all, it really is a drag to hook-up (become sexually active) with people who don't entice you as much as others will. If you continue fooling around with, let's say, the opposite sex, you'll end up saying in the morning: "Great, that was fun, but not really. It almost made me feel queer." In the end you will be disgusted and dissatisfied because you are yearning for something that you have not allowed yourself to acquire. If you are hungry for a different type of love and are not feeding your body and spirit with what you most desire, you will go on starving. I do not know why you would want to do that when there is plenty of food "out" there.

"If you hide yourself from the world, not only will you never hook-up, but you will never be happy."

Dahlia DeSimone

Sexual activity is a very important function of everyday life. If you are not sexually satisfied you may become numb, bored, or even depressed. If you do not get your daily dose of healthy, erotic and pleasurable sexual activity, you might not be as content as you would be if you did.

If you come out and say "hey, I'm gay," not only will people think you are happy, but they will recognize your placement in a certain community. With this, you will have more people (who have similar desires as you do) checking you out. The more checking out, the more opportunity (or prop-portunity) to hook-up. Why wouldn't you want to be sexually active? By resisting your sexual desires, how can you be sated?

Coming out is important because in this life, it is paramount to be yourself all the time. If you hide yourself from the world, not only will you never hook-up, but you will never be happy. If you are a Thespian, then maybe you could play yourself as being straight, but otherwise, your act is foolish and in turn you look like a fool. You will have too many mental fights with yourself, and you will be miserable because, for one fear or the other, you feel trapped in a identity that does not include your necessities.

Look at Ellen for a role model if you need to. She's popular. She is funny, and a pretty good dresser. Let her be your role model to help you accept yourself and feel more accepted in this world. If that does not help, buy a Sarah McLachlan, Cheryl Crow or Indigo Girls CD. Their music can help you hear your own desires, ideas and inclinations, and help you realize you are not the only one who feels the way you do.

Respecting your sexuality is more fun than Nintendo 64 or Sony Play Station. Accepting your sexuality is more fulfilling than Thanksgiving dinner. Loving your sexuality is more captivating than Ani Difranco on stage. Sharing your sexuality is more colorful than any of De Kooning's or Picasso's paintings. Admitting your sexuality is more exciting than a roller-coaster ride. Exercising your sexuality is more engulfing than the ocean, more vivid than a fall day, and more educational than a class taken here at UMass.

Accepting your sexuality is the best thing for you to do, because if you do not accept yourself, you will be very unhappy. Why??? How can you be happy when you do not possess what you want? How can you get all the things you want from life when you don't ask for them? How can you be satisfied watching hot fudge lusciously drip down a sundae, and not eat it? How can you be happy if what you love is not with you, in front of you, or kissing your mouth?

Answer these questions if you will, but it always comes down to the basics. It you deny yourself from yourself, you will never be happy. Just say these words "out" loud if you need to: "Lesbian, Lesbian, Gay, Gay, Bi-sexual, Bi-sexual." Meditate with these words until you feel comfortable enough to use them more often when referring to yourself, or if you're still nervous, to your imaginary friend.

When you are ready, please call upon Biggie Smalls and Diana Ross for some liberating music. "I'm coming out, I'm coming." (And be sure to blast it!)

Dahlia DeSimone is a UMass student.

The f–word

Karen Sonnwald

Here's a little rule to all the dumpers out there: once you dump, depart. Immediately. And here's an addendum to that: don't come back. Ever. Circumstances don't matter. Just leave.

That would be a nice notion, but a little unrealistic, considering that most of the dumper–dumpee pairs are both attendees of this institution. And I don't care how many people go to this school, you're bound to run into your ex at least once a day. In my case, he's not my ex. We were "seeing each other"— or whatever is considered PC today— but for all technical purposes, I still got dumped. Someone better came along (yeah, hardly), so I got kicked to the curb. No harm done. At least not now. But I've had four years to get over it.

See, this was a case of high school love gone bad. I hadn't seen him since graduation. I was strolling through Whitmore when I ran into him. He was carrying coffee. I was wearing it. Utter disbelief is the only phrase that came to mind. I hadn't seen him once at home, and now? Now he was at my school. I'm sure plenty of people run into old friends at UMass, but I'm from Ft. Lauderdale. What are the chances? Slim to none.

And as I looked down at my coffee–stained shirt, I'm embarrassed to admit the next thing I thought was: he probably did it on purpose.

Of course he did.

We had the whole "what–have–you–been–doing–since– graduation" chat. You know the drill. Who do you still talk to? Remember study hall senior year? What's up with (insert his best friend's name here)?

Our conversation was obligatory, as it often is under such circumstances. But in some strange way, it was comfortable too. Here he was, a long lost friend... Uh–oh, the f–word. Could I call him that?

Sure, we had our problems. There was a lot of mud– slinging going on in those days (come on, it was high school). He stomped on my heart, he rammed a knife into my spine and twisted it around. I was no saint either. But that was four years ago. I know how much I'd changed since then. It was quite conceivable that this ego–wounder had changed too.

So we exchanged numbers and swore we'd keep in touch and to my astonishment we did. It was a struggle at first. He was sickeningly polite and then he got chummy. Now he wants to be pals. He slaps me on the back, he talks to me about other girls. It wasn't long before we were throwing back beers over Monday night football. How wonderful... I'm one of the guys.

Funny. After all that time, I still wanted to hate him. And yet I knew better. That was my immaturity talking, the grudge–holder in me shining through. It was the part of me that remembered with astonishing clarity, the hurt— not of his rejection— but rejection nonetheless.

But we get over these things. We hurt for the moment and then it passes. We're all too conditioned to hold on to grievances that really serve no purpose at all. For what? Who cares if he always wanted to hook up with my best friend? What does that mean now? Absolutely nothing. All I know is that moving on and growing up means letting go. And I had.

That doesn't mean I want to hear about all of his latest conquests. I haven't matured that much. But it does mean that I asked myself a simple, and maybe selfish, question: am I better off having him as part of my life? I can answer that easily. I believe I am.

So the next time he calls to tell me about the girl he met over the weekend, that will be okay. I'll be happy for him. And I'll listen. Because, hey, that's what friends do.

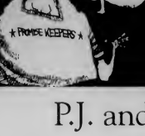
Doonesbury — BY GARRY TRUDEAU



P.J. and the D.J.

There are many types of D.J.s in the world. There's D.J. Kool, D.J. Jazzy Jeff, D.J. Feldman (my friend from camp) and others.

All I needed was a D.J. this weekend. Any D.J., preferably a cheap one.

What I got was Norm.

See, P.J. (my dad) just turned 50. As such, the Merediths decided to throw a bash for the old guy. My older brother and sister came up with the idea. They rented the hall, got all the family friends and relatives up from places like Washington, D.C., Tulsa and Cincinnati, took care of the food and made sure my dad didn't know about it.

Luke Meredith

I had one job. Take care of the D.J. (P.J. was all set).

But it was even easier than that. All I had to do was pay the D.J. My brother Mike knew a guy that worked in the music store in the old Methuen Mall. (Isn't that always the way?)

Mike says he can get this guy for half–price, and he'll work an extra hour for free. Katie (my sister) tells me in May to save $125 from my big Camp Greylock check.

I save the cash. Mike's discount D.J. will be paid.

Then came Norm.

We were setting up when Norm appeared. Nothing fancy at first. Short guy, long "hockey hair," glasses that rode low and a tuxedo that looked like the one you passed over at Mr. Tux when you were picking what to wear to the prom. I was chatting with uncle Bill and cousin Jimmy about football and what not. (You should hear uncle Bill's joke about the farmer and the deaf guy.), when Katie tells me to set the ground rules for Norm.

But Norm was already struggling. See, Norm had just gotten a new system from the guy he used to know at the mall. It was pretty big. He starts off the night by cranking Enya. Cranking Enya.

Complaints abound. I have to deal. Norm says, "Look, the volume's on one. If I go any lower, I'm off. If you wanted me to bring this system, you should have gotten a bigger hall."

He's yelling at me, and he isn't even hammered yet.

The fun started early for Norm. You see, we come to find out later that Norm was "on the wagon." Or he was "off the wagon." (I always get those two mixed up.) Point is, Norm's a lush. But he hasn't had a drink in nine months.

Katie doesn't know this. So Katie asks Norm if he'd like something to drink.

Norm says, "Got any O'Doul's?"

Katie says no, because, if my family's anything, it's a bunch of drinkers — Irish blood, you know. Thus, O'Doul's ranks with Diet Shasta on the list of party "must–haves."

Norm then gives his confessional.

"I haven't had a beer in nine months. I was a mess. I used to work at a biker bar, and you never leave that place sober, if you know what I'm saying."

We had now known Norm for five minutes.

"What the hell, I'll have a beer. But that's it. One and I'm done."

What do you say? Katie grabs him a Heineken.

Time passes, we hide, P.J. comes in and we yell surprise and all that. Things are going well.

But then I see Norm outside having a cigarette. He's no longer drinking a Heineken. He's switched to Bud Light, and he's now hitting on my sister's best friend Lisa.

Norm is married and has three kids.

Norm says to Lisa, "Kiss me."

Lisa says, "No." (Norm is not a stud.)

Norm is struggling. Norm is hammered. Norm breaks up a speech by P.J., who is in the process of praising his kids (me included, amazingly enough), by breaking out his best joke.

"Hey, I know what you mean. I have three kids just like them. One of each sex."

Norm had made a scene. Norm was killing us. Norm was also making me laugh so hard I almost peed my pants.

Norm went home drunk, lonely and struggling. But he made us all laugh. Norm has now etched a unique and special place in Meredith family lore.

By the time I'm 50, Norm will have danced naked on the coffee table with a lamp shade on his head, had sex with Lisa in the middle of the dance floor to "Everybody Plays the Fool" by Paul Anka and drunk a case of beer and a fifth of Jack Daniels.

Norm might have been the worst D.J. ever, but he was funny. And since being funny is being entertaining, and since entertainment is the D.J.'s job, I guess Norm did his job.

But next time we'll have some O'Doul's in stock.

Letters to the Editor

Bikers should take responsibility

To the Editor:

Two months ago, I arrived in Amherst, and having more or less grown up on a bicycle in my native Holland, it became quickly clear to me that Amherst is ideal for getting around on a bike rather than a car. The place is rather compact, the roads are generally suitable and the undulating surface profile provides some real exercise.

Add to that the savings in gasoline, the contribution to cleaner air and the relief from finding a parking space and it is obvious that this is a place to abandon the car for local mobility. Indeed, you see bikers around here, but far less than one would expect in a college town.

And now these brave souls are to be ticketed for disobeying traffic rules. It is getting time! If we ever want to reach a situation where bikers will be accepted as an inherent part of the traffic, they better start behaving as true participants in the overall traffic pattern. The rule should be, and probably is, that a bicyclist is a full, be it relatively slow and unmotorized, participant in the general traffic with all the rights and duties of any motorized vehicle.

Experience in countries with intensive bicycle use in the cities, like the Netherlands, has shown that this is the best and safest way to mix bicycles with motorized traffic. If space permits, it is good to have a bike lane along the roads, but it is not advisable to separate these from the other traffic. This applies to the busy areas of town with dense, slow moving car traffic.

Finally, there is a simple and effective rule to minimize accidents involving cars and bicycles. The cyclist should always be aware that he is by far the weakest in the moving traffic and behave accordingly — in particular obeying traffic signs and indicating clearly with hand signs what he intends to do.

With responsible, flexible and tolerant behavior by all, traffic will flow best and tickets will hardly be necessary.

Social Justice Education not so well funded

To the Editor:

In the Multicultural Affairs section of the Collegian (Sept. 30), one of the articles contained the following incorrect information concerning the allocation of instructional resources within the School of Education: "Certain programs such as the Social Justice Education program, receive funding for eight to 10 TA/TOs, while such programs as the Curriculum and Learning receive none."

Please note the following correction: Social Justice Education is a program housed within the Department of Student Development & Pupil Personnel Services (SDPPS). For the academic year '97–'98, only 2.80 TA/TOs were assigned to the SIE program. This constituted a cut–back in the TA allotment given to SIE in the previous academic year. In point of fact, our entire department, which also houses programs in Special Education, School Psychology and School Guidance Counseling, received, on average, less than three TAships per program. Like most units throughout the School of Education, we have experienced severe underfunding of our TA needs, and any suggestion that we have been overfunded at the expense of another unit or program is a form of misinformation.

SUDDENLY SUSAN
When: 8 p.m. (NBC)
Starring: Brooke Shields

What do you get when you put a leggy former model into a sitcom? NBC tried this experiment and the result came up "Suddenly Susan." In the past, poor writing and cliched jokes hurt the Brooke Shields' sitcom. But amazingly, this show is back and even more surprising—it's in the family–oriented 8 p.m. slot. The adult–humor in "Suddenly Susan" is wittier than other shows, like "Friends," but is still tired and limp. But unlike other shows which are posing as hits, "Susan" still comes across at times sophisticated and actually funny. B– (Seema Gangatirkar)

MELROSE PLACE
When: 8 p.m. (Fox)
Starring: Heather Locklear, Jack Wagner

Please tell me that no one still watches this crap. After "Models, Inc.," I didn't think Aaron Spelling could sink any lower.
Does anyone care about who Michael is fooling around with or if Amanda and Peter are on or off? I'll admit (though not easily) that I watched "Melrose" a few years ago, but when that loser from "Baywatch" took up residence, I began to count the minutes until "Monday Night Football" came on. Still do as a matter of fact. F (Marty Keane)

COSBY
When: 8 p.m. (CBS)
Starring: Bill Cosby, Phylicia Rashad

Landing Bill Cosby was probably one of CBS' big coups last season. And while "Cosby" hasn't enjoyed the solid number of its predecessor, "The Cosby Show," it didn't grab the dismal ratings of some other Monday night sitcoms, like "Ink."
This season, CBS once again has "Cosby" anchoring the Monday night line–up and the big question is whether Cosby can make America laugh again. Admittedly, this second time around for Cosby hasn't been quite the hit CBS hoped for, but it's still solid. While the laughs are few, Cosby's quirkiness and gooly charm remain the show's strength. B+ (S.G.)

FIRED UP
When: 8:30 p.m. (NBC)
Starring: Sharon Lawrence

When talking up "Fired Up," one has to wonder why Sharon Lawrance ever left "NYPD Blue" for this silly sitcom.

SOUL MAN
When: 8 p.m., (ABC)
Starring: Dan Aykroyd, Melinda McGraw

"Soul Man" has returned this season after a previous short run, and thanks to the cynical charm of the lovable Dan Aykroyd, his new show is a refreshing dose of harmless sitcom fun. Aykroyd plays a suburban minister trying to manage his family after his wife passes on. Aykroyd is, however, not your average clergyman. He rides a Harley and digs classic rock, not to mention, he's making the moves on a journalist who has a crush on him. Despite the fact that most of the jokes are derived from the fact that Aykroyd's a hip man of the cloth, "Soul Man" is filled with clever wit and some hilarious moments. B (Adam Levine)

MAD ABOUT YOU
When: 8 p.m. (NBC)
Starring: Paul Reiser, Helen Hunt

Jamie and Paul Buchman have finally had their baby after a season–long labor and a summer vacation without a name for the child.

Now, they have brought their daughter Mabel (Mothers Always Bring Extra Love, according to Jamie's mom, played by Carol Burnett) to their New York apartment.

Having a baby in the house has brought out the mushy side in the new parents as the two adjust to parenthood.

The usual quick comedy between Paul Reiser's Paul and Helen Hunt's Jamie are not lacking with the addition of a new family member.

"Mad About You" also takes on a new twist this season by welcoming an openly gay character, a la "Ellen." Paul's sister Deb's character, who realized her sexuality last season ("We never should have let her play field hockey," Sylvia, Paul's mother, said.), is more in the spirit of Ross' ex–wife on "Friends" than Ellen DeGeneras' character.

But with Deb's budding storyline and Mabel now in the house, the reported last season of the show (Hunt has said she won't return for another year) should be a stylishly funny one. B+ (Casey Kane)

NEWSRADIO
When: 8:30 p.m. (NBC).
Starring: Phil Hartman,

The likeable cast at WRKX started its new season by reaching new heights as Jon Lovitz and Phil Hartman almost crashed to all–time lows.

THE TONY DANZA SHOW
When: 8 p.m., (NBC)
Starring: Tony Danza, Maria Canals

He is one of the most eclectic actors in the sitcom genre and now he has returned for another shot at the small screen. This time around, Danza plays a New York City sports–writer named Danny Thomas. Amazingly enough, Danza's character isn't a Tony this time, but he still sticks to his cliché role of a humble Italian pop, who is always on the backs of his daughters to stay out of trouble. Danza's complacent, yet witty persona attracts not only a more reserved older audience, but easily lures a much more youthful audience. The show contains rough spots, though, which tend to emit from the edgy supporting cast. Even so, the new sitcom is an ingenuous family show that was well overdue. B+ (Alex Iglesias)

BEVERLY HILLS 90210
When: 8 p.m., (Fox)
Starring: Jason Priestley, Jennie Garth

There comes a time in a show's life when it must pack up and move on.

Unfortunately, "Beverly Hills 90210" did not take a cue from "Roseanne's" graceful exit and is now limping into its seventh season.

With a couple new additions rounding out the cast, there is an opportunity here for "90210" to breathe some new life into its ailing script. Vincent Young joins up as Noah, a love–interest for the perpetually pouty and never interesting Valerie (Tiffani–Amber Thiessen). Steve (Ian Zering) finds a new challenge in Carly, played by Hilary Swank.

But whatever happens in the most famous zip code on television, you can be sure it will never live up to its youth. C (Seema Gangatirkar)

PARTY OF FIVE
When: 9 p.m., (Fox)
Starring: Scott Wolf, Neve Campbell

Three seasons ago, it did not look as if "Party of Five" would make it. But critical acclaim hailing the FOX drama as one of the best on television saved the show from an early demise and now the best looking family on television is entering their fourth season.
Dealing with tough issues has always been "Party of Five's" strong suit and this season promises to be no different. From alcoholism to marriage to

FRIENDS
When: 8 p.m, (NBC)
Starring: Jennifer Aniston, David Schwimmer

Dropping to number 4 in the Neilson ratings, few would deny that the ever–popular sitcom "Friends" has lost some of its momentum this season. With the Ross and Rachel break–apart–get–back–together subplot completely exhausted, fans are likewise getting tired — although, it is a bit more entertaining to watch the couple bicker than kiss. Perhaps it's time to try to bring in a new Friend, to spice things up a bit. Unless someone goes and gets some radical haircut, the "Friends" might be looking for a new place to hang out in the Thursday night line–up. B– (Laura Stock)

UNION SQUARE
When: 8:30 p.m., (NBC)
Starring: Jim Pirri, Christine Burke

It's right off the streets of trendy downtown Manhattan. The 20–ish posse of seven random individuals — each unique in their ways — seeks out each other's warmth and companionship at the local diner. Somewhat resembling more of an informal version of "Friends," this group adds more of a working class tonality to the typical New York storyline. A pure comical treat, this show truthfully represents that sarcastic New York humor which many shows within the same setting lack. How can you beat Jim Pirr as the tough, Italian ex–con ladies man who displays machismo demeanor in every dialogue? B (Alex Iglesias)

SEINFELD
When: 9 p.m. (NBC)
Starring: Jerry Seinfeld, Michael Richards

The king of comedy, Seinfeld is — along with The Simpsons — the funniest show on television and NBC's crown jewel. What has made this legendary show "about nothing" into a television landmark (in addition to television's best writing team) are the wickedly funny bit players; Kenny Bania, Jerry and George's parents, Uncle Leo and Jerry's ever–present überfoe, Newman. The key to each of these delicious foils' success is that they only appear in short, potent doses. I mean, how much of Uncle Leo's yelling into a telephone could one take?

Thus far, the new season's two episodes have both been riotously funny laugh–out–loud fests. From George's hilarious new job at Play Now to the re–birth of Kramerica,

SABRINA
When: 8 p.m., (ABC)
Starring: Melissa Joan Hart

On a dismal night of television, only one thing saves Friday night—that would be Hart as Sabrina, the teenaged witch.
In a season when ABC has lost two out of its four Friday night shows to CBS, the network ought to be glad it held on to "Sabrina." Forget "Family Matters" and "Step by Step," "Sabrina" is the best of the bunch.
Couple Hart's innate good–humor and matter–of–fact attitude with a healthy dose of the strange and original, and you've got "Sabrina." Of course, a talking cat named Salem doesn't hurt either or a pair of wonderfully quirky aunts. My advice? If you've got to watch television on a Friday, check out "Sabrina" and skip the rest. A (Seema Gangatirkar)

MEEGO
When: 8:30 p.m. (CBS)
Starring: Bronson Pinchot, Jonathon Lipnicki

Okay. Basic lessons to making a hit— avoid the alien thing, it's been done before. And just because you've got accent–crazy Pinchot and a cute little bugger named Lipnicki, success isn't guaranteed.

In fact, Pinchot as an alien named Meego is about as funny as having your wisdom teeth out. And sweet and adorable as he might have been in Jerry Maguire, Lipnicki sounds canned and rehearsed in this CBS comedy. F (S.G.)

THE GREGORY HINES SHOW
When: 8 p.m., (CBS)
Starring: Gregory Hines

CBS did several things very right this season. Two of those things were grabbing "Family Matters" and "Step by Step" away from ABC. The last thing was securing "The Gregory Hines Show."

While he might not get the laughs other comics garner, Hines has put together a straight–forward, normal sitcom. In a night of aliens and magic, it is refreshing to have a show focused on the normal issues facing a single father and his son. And unlike other Friday night sitcoms, Hines avoids the sugary flavor. B (S.G.)

DR. QUINN, MEDICINE WOMAN
When: 8 p.m. (CBS)
Starring: Jane Seymour, Joe Lando

There's something about the wild west that excites writers into coming up with things like "Dr. Quinn." But to be honest, on a Saturday night, people aren't sitting home watching television. And most wouldn't schedule their night around the politically correct fodder offered by Seymour's cute family drama.

Unlike many shows out there, there is chemistry between the characters on this show and with the exception of Chad Allen, most of them look like they're having a great time.

There's a certain amount of drama and tension in this show — mixed in with a healthy dose of idealism. This is a program for the cynical at heart and ought to be taken with a grain of salt. B (Seema Gangatirkar)

PROFILER
When: 10 p.m., (NBC)
Starring: Ally Walker

If it's not funny or filled with magic, you've got to try something else to pull in viewers. Hence the reasoning behind NBC's Saturday "Thrillogy." For those familiar with this line–up, it's evident that the thrills from "The Pretender" and "Profiler" are few and far between.

"Profiler" manages to pull itself out of the abyss it has landed itself into — but just barely. The writing is awful, the story–lines convoluted and disturbed — not to mention a stalker who just won't go away. The one saving grace on this show is Walker as the profiler. There is something eerie about Walker's eyes, which fits in perfectly with the creepy premise of this show. But for real thrills, try "The X–Files." C (S.G.)

SATURDAY NIGHT LIVE
When: 11:30 p.m. (NBC)
Starring: Darryl Hammond, Norm MacDonald

A few years ago, many wrote this sketch–based live comedy show off after three decades on the air. After some major tinkering, "Saturday Night Live" — while not totally recapturing the glory days that spawned the careers of such luminaries as Dana Carvey, Chevy Chase, Eddie Murphy and Bill Murray — has regained a good deal of credibility. Of the new cast, Darryl Hammond is poised to be the next breakout star. Taking over for Phil Hartman as SNL's in–house impersonario, his take on

THE SIMPSONS
When: 8 p.m., (Fox)
Starring: Yeardley Smith, Harry Shearer

"The Simpsons" is one of the few remaining programs to have survived from Fox's shaky beginning and its popularity has continuously escalated from cult status to mainstream success. This season secures "The Simpsons" position in TV history as the longest running prime time animated program ever. Judging by this season's first two episodes, Matt Groening's lovable nuclear family (no pun intended on the nuclear part) is still the greatest satire America has ever known. However, we have recently seen a new side to "The Simpsons" comic genius, a more serious side that is. Namely the episode where we found out that Principal Skinner is not the man we believed him to be. What other surprises does this season have in store for us, maybe somebody will get shot. But wait — didn't they already do that once? A+ (Adam Levine)

MEN BEHAVING BADLY
When: 8 p.m., (NBC)
Starring: Rob Schneider and Ken Marino

The nasty boys are back and already up to their usual boyish, or let us say manly antiques. Even with the recasting, which replaced Justine Bateman and Ron Eldard, the show still strives on its caustic humor. So far it's off to a quick transitional start with the marriage of Sarah (Bateman) and Kevin (Eldard). Jamie (Rob Schneider) has already acquired his new found roommate, Steve (Ken Marino) who coincidentally happens to break up with his girlfriend — hence we are at the beginning of last year. Not to mention the fact that Jamie has met his new found girl, Katie (Jenica Bergere), who lives next door. A– (Alex Iglesias)

TOUCHED BY AN ANGEL
When: 8 p.m., (CBS)
Starring: Roma Downey, Della Reese

CBS grabbed an image last year as "America's Network" and began to "Welcome Home" viewers to its family oriented programming. Leading off the charge two seasons ago was the cheesy but heartwarming "Touched By An Angel." Now back for its third season on CBS, "Touched By An Angel" is a solid top 10 hit every week.

There's a good reason why this show hits the Nielsens where it matters: it makes people feel good about themselves and adds a note of spirituality in times when life is too hectic to think of praying. With Downey's warm Irish brogue and Reese's solid advice, this show is indeed a welcome home. A (Seema Gangatirkar)

KING OF THE HILL
When: 8:30 p.m. (Fox)
Created by: Mike Judge

A meeting of the minds between the creative forces behind "The Simpsons," "Seinfeld" and MTV's "Beavis & Butt– head," Fox's animated "King of the Hill" is a lazily paced look at life in the Heartland—Arlen, Texas, to be exact.

Co–creator Mike Judge lends his voice (eerily familiar to "B&B"s clueless Tom Anderson) to the man of the house, Hank Hill — a man with the same out–of–touch views as Homer Simpson, but a little more laid back.

Compared with its lead–in — the irreplaceable "Simpsons" — "King of the Hill" is just a little too tame. While utilizing much of the oblique blink–and–you–missed–it humor techniques of Homer & company, too much of "King of the Hill" gets bogged down in meaningless down–home drivel that is of no amusement to us Northerners. This being said, it still beats "Jenny." C (Marty Keane)

THE X–FILES
When: 9 p.m. (Fox)
Starring: David Duchovney, Gillian Anderson

Hands down, "The X–Files" is both the most intriguing and interesting program on TV since "Star Trek: The Next Generation." With 12 Emmy nominations and two Golden Globe wins for best dramatic program, Agents Fox Mulder and Dana Scully continue their quest for the truth into their fifth season. With the premiere being pushed back to Nov. 2, on account of production delays on the feature film due out hopefully this summer, The X–Files follows creator Chris Carter's fascination with government bureaucracy and unexplained phenomena. This season should answer many old questions, such as who the smoking man really works for and is he really Mulder's true father? So

Sonny Rollins to play tonight at MHC

COURTESY PAUL DINNOCENZO

Randy Brecker just released a new album titled Into the Sun.

Tonight, the Pioneer Valley (Mount Holyoke College in particular) is hosting one of the greatest musicians of this century. Sonny Rollins has been a figure in jazz for more than 50 years now, yet still retains a fascinating reservoir of energy and imagination. He plays tonight at Chapin Auditorium at MHC and will be a show the Valley will long remember. We should all feel very privileged.

However, on disc this week, we find some St. Louis Blues — yes, the Gateway city which has produced the artistic talents of a wide range of innovators like Ike & Tina Turner, Miles Davis and the writer William S. Burroughs. The disc in question is Unwanted Child (Hightone) from Ms. Clara McDaniel and, despite sometimes boring repetition of modern blues style, the performances of McDaniel (with her low and emotional growl) and the touches of a wonderful horn section make this at least a sincere effort.

Also, helping out McDaniel is a wonderful rhythm section of Johnnie Johnson (the piano behind most of Chuck Berry's greatest hits), bassist Gus Thornton and drummer Kenny Rice, as well as a very small-room, but not superficial mix.

Jazz pianist Hank Jones has long been a proponent for jazz education, especially overseas. Straight from the legendary Jones brothers of jazz (his brother, Elvin, was part of John Coltrane's great 1961-65 quartet. His brother Thad, a trumpeter, played in many famous big bands, including Duke Ellington's), Hank Jones has been especially instrumental in jazz education at Osaka School Of Music in Japan. In fact, his latest release, Favors (Verve), is from a 1996 live workshop he performed, partly in a trio format (with George Mraz on bass and Dennis Mackrel on drums), and partly with a big band consisting of Osaka students added to the trio.

The production (by Junji Takahashi) is amazing with its strong, booming, melodic bass lines by Mraz and even more demanding drum sound, with the ocean of piano sound in the middle really bringing to life Jones' trio's mastery of themes, and soloing (each of the three musicians solo in each of the trio tunes). The big band adds harmonic color and comments to the trio's playing, more than the trio just being a rhythm section for the horns. The standard "On Green Dolphin St." and Thad Jones' "A Child Is Born" are especially exciting and moving tracks.

In the "for Pete's sake, let it go" department, I'll continue with my ongoing, ridiculous foray into the field of "smooth jazz." Guess what? We may have found some of this basically elevator-oriented music that does not completely lack any musical significance! Randy Brecker (half of the contemporary jazz team The Brecker Brothers; the other half is Michael Brecker, who played at Northampton's Iron Horse just last night) has released his latest, Into The Sun, on Concord Vista Records.

Brecker keeps his compositions quite Brazilian in foundation and the synthesizers that are usually a commanding quality to any "smooth jazz" is not given full reign here. His relaxing trumpet and flugelhorn solos are, in production terms, "wet as water," though, drenched in reverb and echo effects. While it is true that some songs are kind of cheesy, there are some that stand up to good contemporary electric jazz (Medeski, Martin and Wood, for example), such as the upbeat bossa nova tune "The Sleaze Factor" and "Grey Area" with its quite heavy crunching guitar at moments. Definitely not a loser — not totally.

In re-issue news, Verve Records carry on their Talkin' Verve series, based on the "roots of acid jazz," with a new edition by guitarist George Benson. With vocalists as well as the premier of the jazz high court (Herbie Hancock, Ron Carter, Billy Cobham), he moves through some guitar jazz with a secretly funky beat to it, as well as singing a particularly Motown-ish R&B tune, "That Lucky Old Sun (Just Rolls Around Heaven All Day" and an amazing organ trio tune "Some Of My Best Friends Are Blues" written by Jimmy Smith and performed by Smith (who is hypnotic in his virtuosity on the Hammond organ), Benson and drummer Donald Bailey.

This disc could do without his covers of the songs "You Make Me Feel Like A Natural Woman" and "People Get Ready" that sound basically like he took the Lady Soul album from Aretha Franklin and substituted his guitar for her voice — backing vocals and string arrangements allowed to stay intact.

CHUMBAWAMBA
Tubthumper
Republic/Universal

A curious mix of atmospheric ambience and bottom-of- the-barrell electro-pop, Chumbawamba's debut, Tubthumper (Republic/Universal) — while earnest and fun — never quite lights a fire.

Hailing from northern England, this collective's influences reach out far and wide — from jazz to hip-hop to rock. It's too bad that Chumbawamba's hit single, the utterly infectious "Tubthumping," is little more than a 1997 version of Republica's "Ready To Go."

Beyond that song's call-and-response chorus, there just aren't enough memorable moments here to make this a worthwhile release. For those who are hooked by the anthemic party sounds of Tubthumping, wait until Shaun Ryder's (Black Grape) second offing Stupid, Stupid, Stupid which is scheduled for release early next year. Understanding Eating Disorders:
Strategies for Friends and Families
Tuesday, October 14, 1997
Room 904-08
6:30 - 8 p.m. - Murray Lincoln Campus Center, UMass
I think my roommate has an eating disorder.
How can I be sure? What should I do?
I think my sister is anorexic and she isn't getting any help.
How can I convince her to see a professional?
Who should I suggest.. Where should she go?
I'm concerned about my friend who has bulimia.
She says it's under control, but I don't think it is.
I'm really afraid... What can I do to help?

Quick and easy rice and beans

DORMROOM GOURMET by Louis Davis

How many times have you looked in your fridge and wish that there was something that you could just pull out, throw in a bowl and nuke for a satisfying and healthy meal in minutes? And how many times have you resorted instead to ordering a pizza or a sub? Well, with just a little advanced preparation, you can have a week's worth of this magic meal by spending 30 minutes whipping up my dorm room version of rice and beans.

I'm sure you've had many derivations of this classic South American dish. Because rice and beans are usually served as an accompaniment to an entree, they are often pretty bland, serving as a backdrop to the featured meat or fish that's being served with it.

This "main dish" version is anything but bland. It has a savory sweet and sour type of taste and packs quite a kick — not hot, but intense. And because it contains all the essential amino acids, it needs only to be paired with a green vegetable to complete a fully balanced vegetarian meal. These beans will help to dispel the myth that healthy food has to taste harsh.

Like I always say, whenever and whatever you're cooking, think safety (and flavor) first. Have a fire extinguisher close by and be sure to provide for proper ventilation. Rock and boil!

Optimal Ease Rice and Beans

Ingredients for beans
2 Tbs. olive oil
1 onion, diced small
1 jalapeno pepper, minced (optional)
1 Tbs. chopped garlic
1 tsp. oregano
1/2 small can tomato paste
3 Tbs. vinegar (balsamic or red wine)
3 Tbs. booze (tequila is best, but beer will do)
Juice of 1 lime
1 can beans (black, pink or navy)
2/3 cup salsa (hot or mild, your choice)
1 Tbs. sugar
1/2 bunch chopped fresh cilantro (optional)
Salt and pepper to taste
Ingredients for rice
1 1/2 cups white rice
3 cups water
2 tsp. salt
Procedure

• Over a burner set on medium high, preheat a large skillet. Add the oil and then the onions and cook, stirring every minute or so, until they start to take on a brown carmelization (not burnt). This is the time to add a little salt and pepper and the oregano.

• Add the garlic, pepper (if including) and tomato paste and stir to incorporate. This should cook for about four to five minutes to bring out the natural sweetness in the tomato (a classical technique called pince).

• Very carefully, add the vinegar, the booze and the lime juice. When the liquid comes up to a boil (cooking off all the alcohol), stir well and scrape the bottom of the pan to incorporate all the accumulation of browned bits (called the fond). This will deglaze the pan.

• Add the whole can of beans (with the liquid) and the salsa. Mix in the sugar and bring up to a boil. At this point, lower the heat so the mixture simmers and cook for about 8 to 10 minutes. Season to taste with salt and pepper, a little more lime juice or some hot sauce. Serve over rice and add cilantro just before eating.

For perfect rice

Making perfect rice is so simple, but yet it's so exclusive. This is a fool-proof method I guarantee will work every time.

• Add rice, salt and water to a sauce pan with a tight fitting lid.

• Place over high heat and bring to a boil.

• Reduce heat to the lowest setting and let it simmer for exactly 17 minutes. Do not remove lid.

• Turn off heat and allow to rest for five minutes. Remove lid, fluff with a fork and enjoy.

Serving suggestions

Although this dish is great all by itself, with the addition of some lettuce, fresh tomato, cheese and a tortilla, you have the makings for one awesome burrito or taco. Also, try placing a fried egg and some guacamole over a mound of this manna — it makes for a great Sunday brunch!

Third Eye Blind fast & explosive

By Alexandria Lipka
Collegian Correspondent

THIRD EYE BLIND / THE DAMBUILDERS
Pearl Street
Oct. 6

NORTHAMPTON — I started the evening off knowing one thing about Third Eye Blind; they play one of those catchy little tunes that is constantly on the radio. I've never really heard the song in its entirety because I always end up switching the station before it's over. However, by the time the evening was over, I once again realized that nothing beats a live performance and you can't really trust everything that you hear on the radio.

To get things going, The Dambuilders, described as alternative pop — whatever that means — treated and/or tormented the crowd to some highly electric, and often whimsical, noise. Take any indie rock band, give them an extremely sharp razor edge and you pretty much have The Dambuilders, but to compare them to a more well-known artist is not only very difficult but also immensely unfair. Singer and bassist Dave Derby's use of repetition on songs like "Break Up With Your Boyfriend" worked so well with the edgy guitar of Eric Masunaga, and both were neatly packaged by the stinging percussion of drummer Kevin March. Violinist and backup vocals by Joan Wasser added yet another sound to your already ringing ears — and if you were anywhere near the stage during their last few songs you really regretted not bringing earplugs.

Third Eye Blind began their set powerfully with the fast and explosive "Losing a Whole Year." Singer Stephan Jenkins appeared on stage, only after the rest of his bandmates had begun playing, to demonstrate a well rehearsed tambourine routine and to prove to the audience that he can indeed sing with his hands in his pockets.

A little later on in the show, a well planned repose on top of a speaker made this production a bit too orchestrated for my tastes. But despite their lack of spontaneity, I found Third Eye Blind to be surprisingly danceable thanks to the playful bass of Arion Salazar and the rhythmic beats of Brad Hargreaves' drumming.

Confirming that he can also play guitar, Jenkins donned that all too familiar open-mouthed, pensive visage during "Motorcycle Drive By," while the ladies screamed for more. And more they got, but in the form of the fast and sometimes heavy "Horror Show" and my personal favorite of the night, "I Don't Want To Go To London" — a Weezer-esque type piece thanks to the whiny but enjoyable guitar of Cadogen.

Third Eye Blind did end up playing that catchy little tune that is always on the radio entitled "Semi-Charmed Life" and the crowd rightfully ate it up, as well as an all too short cover of The Smiths "Please, Please, Please, Let Me Get What I Want" for part of the encore. By the end of the show, the entire band seemed grateful for having such a devoted audience, but then again, maybe they just thanked us because they felt that they had to.

I would say that Third Eye Blind has the potential to crank out many more albums if they don't let all of the recent Top 40 fame go to their heads; but it might already be too late for that.

Paying tribute to one of America's truest forms of art: the comic book

Hello everyone, and welcome to the Collegian's new weekly column featuring information, reviews and commentary about the world of comic books. Sequential art, one of the only true American art forms, has been with us now for close to 100 years and has fought long and hard to escape the label of "trash" or "kids' stuff."

Jeff Carter

Well, I hope to set things straight with this column and prove that comics are a fun, interesting, viable art form that won't rot your mind or turn you into a pimply degenerate. Please feel free to e-mail me comments and suggestions on what you'd like to see in this column at Scribe1974@aol.com.

I think I'll inaugurate this column with some thoughts on something every Marvel Comics reader has been screaming for since last September. I'm speaking of Marvel's merciful decision to end their God-awful year-long experiment Heroes Reborn, and bring the books back into regular continuity. You'll recall Heroes Reborn was the controversial move that handed over creative control of Marvel stalwarts Captain America, Iron Man, Fantastic Four, and The Avengers, over to Jim Lee, Rob Liefeld, and other image Comics creators for 12 issues. This deal also allowed the Image creators to change the origins of these beloved characters, since they now lived in an "alternate reality" separate from the core Marvel Universe (Oh, my kingdom for an alternate reality where Rob Liefeld is just a community college student servin' up fries at the local Burger King). Now that the experiment is over, we can look forward to these four classic comics return to glory following the Heroes Reborn: The Return miniseries by Peter David and Sal Larocca, which wraps up later this month. Captain America and The Fantastic Four stream audience, but deserves to be heard nonetheless. Thankfully, the rest of the album achieves the same gorgeous, melodic qualities of "Beautiful South." The individual songs — written by vocalist/guitarist Bek-Jean Stewart and bassist Grant Shanahan — blend a poppy-rock with a Celtic/folk sound, creating one of the most interesting musical styles of any contemporary band.

On the whole, Eva Trout's first American release is a rare gem lost in the stream of alt-rock icons. It is questionable whether or not Eva Trout will ever achieve any mainstream success, but they are a band to watch as they are quite likely to develop a large "cult" following. A- (Kevin Monahan)

THE SUNDAYS
Static & Silence
DGC

Five years ago, the Sundays seemed to disappear and made their fans blind (also the title of their last album from 1992) to the English quartet. Finally, joy has come to those who love the ambient and light sounds of guitars that seem in orbit above the head of the tender voice of Harriett Wheeler, with echoing drums and deep bass supporting the sound.

The new album, Static & Silence (DGC), has the same ideas as the mellow Blind and the more upbeat pop of the 1990's Reading, Writing & Arithmetic, but the band has been able to finally mix those two sounds into a splendid hybrid — with more mature lyrics than those that Wheeler had sung so ethereally five and seven years ago.

String arrangements heighten the majestic beauty of "Folk Song," and "I Can't Wait" allows the listener to imagine The Sundays as an old Motown (i.e. Joshua Boyd) return to shelves in November, followed by The Avengers and Iron Man in December.

Perhaps the only bad aspect of this return is that all of the old sequential numbering of these books is destroyed forever. Captain America,for instance, will not resume with #455. All the books will start over again with new #1 issues. The creative teams on the four titles are as follows (writer first, then artist):

•Captain America: Mark Waid and Ron Garney. This is an amazing team who were unjustly yanked off of Captain America in the middle of their amazing run. Welcome back guys.

•The Avengers: Kurt Busiek and George Perez. Damn, this creative team has me more excited than a 12 year–old at his first Marylin Manson concert. Busiek may be the best super hero writer today, and Perez is by far the greatest Avengers penciller of all time. This is going to be good.

•Iron Man: Kurt Busiek and Sean Chen. Now this is a duo ol' shellhead can be proud of! Busiek's accolades speak for themselves, and Chen is perfect for this title after illustrating the similar X–O Menowar.

•Fantastic Four: Scott Lobdell and Alan Davis. We'll just have to wait and see about this one. By far the weakest creative team on any of the returning books.

Now, some of you Thor fans might be saying, "Hey, what about the God of Thunder?" Well, quit your whining. In addition to starring in The Avengers, Thor has in own title in the works. John Romita Jr., artist of Peter Parker: Spider– Man, is in negotiations to draw a new Thor title to be called Thor: God of Thunder. However, don't look for it until Spring 1998.

Review time folks: *Batman: Legends of the Dark Knight #100 (DC, $3.95)*In this 64 page anniversary issue, longtime Batman scribe Dennis O' Neil and artist Dave Taylor recount the origin of Dick Grayson, the original Robin. Fist off, the gorgeous Alex Ross cover adorning this issue is reason enough alone to shell out the $3.95. Hell, this guy's artwork is so incredible he could paint a Bananas in Pajamas comic book and make it cool enough to sell half a million copies. The main story retelling the origin of Robin (isn't this like the tenth time they've done this?) is a nice, smooth read, but does little to introduce us to any story elements about Dick Grayson we didn't already know. The real story here is the new experimental art technique in which Dave Taylor's beautiful pencils are scanned into a computer and digitally colored and rendered without being hand–inked. This gives the story a faded, dreamlike quality that makes you feel as if you were looking into young Dick Grayson's head and experiencing his memories. The back up feature, by writer James Robinson and penciller Lee Weeks, tells the story of Jason Todd's (the second Robin) first day as Robin and his last day as he dies at the hands of the Joker. This is a brief, but powerful story with solid artwork by the underrated Weeks. Throw in an excellent pin–up section by talented artists such as Frank Miller, Mike Mignola and Gene Ha, and you have a very nice package for $3.95. A–

Well, that's all for this week everyone. Until next time. "Live fast, fight hard, and die with your mask on!"

■ Monday

After a three–year run on one of television's best dramas, Lawrence packed her bags and jumped ship to NBC to headline her own comedy. She should have stayed with "Blue." The laughs in this show are mostly canned— you get the feeling you've seen it before. And Lawrence is woefully prone to overacting. Her lack of any personal charisma also hurts the show and the weak supporting cast doesn't help her either. It's no secret that NBC declared this show a hit last season— it followed "Seinfeld." Now Lawrence faces the irksome burden of buoying a miserable show before NBC gets wise. D (S.G.)

ALLY MCBEAL
When: 9 p.m. (Fox)
Starring: Calista Flockhart, Courtney Thorne–Smith

David E. Kelley just can't stay out of television. First it was "Picket Fences" and then the fading "Chicago Hope." Now Kelley returns to the quirkiness of "Fences" with a decidedly innovate hour of drama in "Ally McBeal."

Starring award–winning Broadway actress Calista Flockhart, "Ally" is a humorous and insightful show. B (S.G.)

CYBILL
When: 9:30 p.m. (CBS)
Starring: Cybill Shepard, Christine Baranski

There is something wonderfully charming, if not crass, about "Cybill." The premise of this show involves two women who are constantly belly–aching about men and yet— it's still funny.

And who would have ever thought Shepard, who played Maddy on "Moonlighting," could ever have a funny bone in her body? Given the chance, Shepard has turned her image around and made a hit comedy about a middle–aged, fading actress. And having a great supporting cast like Christine Baranski, DeeDee Pfieffer and Alan Rosenberg helps a rather stiff Shepard keep the laughs coming. B+ (S.G.)

CAROLINE IN THE CITY
When: 9 p.m. (NBC)
Starring: Lea Thompson

When "Caroline" first hit the air two years ago, the first thought was: this is NBC's first bomb. But the "Single Guy" made the exodus first and now "Caroline" is a strong enough show to move to NBC's rather weak Monday night line–up.

"Caroline" is the type of comedy that drives you absolutely insane. For once, the writers are maintaining their integrity and not giving the viewers what they want. But at the same time, how long can people possibly watch Caroline not get together with Richard? You can argue the Sam and Diane scenario from "Cheers," but it's only a matter of time before viewers get tired of the teasing and switch the channel. B– (S.G.)

BROOKLYN SOUTH
When: 10 p.m. (CBS)
Starring: Klea Scott, Adam Rodriguez

This new cop drama from the king of cop dramas, Steven Bochco, is the most explosive new show to debut this season. Already given a TV–MA rating as a result of graphic content, "Brooklyn South" is the story about the officers of Brooklyn's 74th precinct. Credit must be given for this show's attempt at some kind of believable realism as it examines, not only the glamour of being a cop as most of these programs do, but also the tough choices to be made and the ongoing urban violence that plagues our city streets. But, the one thing about "Brooklyn South" that is just so ridiculous is how good looking all the characters are. Even though the cast is rather talented, suspension of disbelief can only go so far. these people should be on a runway and not getting all dirty as they chase thugs through back alleys. B+ (Adam Levine)

■ Tuesday

The season opener picked up where last season left off, and the comic high jinks of office offbeat Beth and the physical zaniness of dimwitted Matthew provide more than enough straight–out comedy to balance the sarcastic and underlying wit of Hartman and company. A (C.K.)

FRASIER
When: 9 p.m. (NBC)
Starring: Kelsey Grammar, Jane Leeves

Kelsey Grammar has come a long way from a mere "Cheers" spin–off, and the success is definitely warranted. Grammar's Freezer started its new season with an impromptu trip to Mexico that resulted in a relationship with former "Sisters" star Sela Ward.

A zoology doctoral candidate and model, Ward seems almost too good to be true. And to Freezer's chagrin, his father, brother Niles and housekeeper Daphne, agree — and don't believe a word of his story.

The season opener left something to be desired after several years of biting wit between the psycho–analyzing brothers, but Freezer's comedic style came on strong in the season's second episode.

A rare display of brotherly love resulted in an episode that both pulled at the heart strings and tickled the funny bone.

"Freezer" is a staple of NBC's Tuesday night line–up, and despite a slow start, that trend should only continue. A (C.K.)

JUST SHOOT ME
When: 9:30 p.m. (NBC)
Starring: David Spade, Laura San Giacomo

Former "Saturday Night Live" comedian David Spade makes his network return in a show that was used as filler at the end of last season.

In "Just Shoot Me" Spade plays a personal assistant to the editor of Blush magazine. Laura San Giacomo plays the editor's daughter and one of the magazine's top writers.

Spade adds a caustic wit that has been lacking since his departure from the late night weekend sketch comedy. And his friendship with photographer Elliot only furthers the biting wit.

The story line is a bit predictable, and San Giamcomo's Mayra can be a bit preachy and proverbing, but Spade and his cohort make the show well worth watching. B+ (C.K.)

NYPD BLUE
When: 10 p.m. (ABC)
Starring: Dennis Franz, Jimmy Smits

Easily the grittiest, most brutal show to ever hit prime time network television, "NYPD Blue" continues to be ABC's sole saving grace. If not for delightfully gruff Andy Sipowicz (Dennis Franz) and the too–suave–for–his–own–good Bobby Simone (Jimmy Smits), lord only knows the headaches new entertainment president Jaime Tarses would be having.

The current season started off strong — clearing Sipowicz from the Joey Salvo killing — and hasn't looked back since. Tuesday's episode was especially strong, ending in a spontaneous hug between Andy and Bobby. In the words of Homer Simpson, "I wish I were more like Sipowicz." A– (Marty Keane)

OZ
When: 11 p.m. (HBO)
Starring: Ernie Hudsen

Last season introduced not only HBO's first dramatic series, but also perhaps the most provocative programming ever introduced to television. Tom Fontana and Barry Levison, the creative team behind "Homicide," have developed a bitterly intense weekly series about Baltimore's high security prison Oswald Penitenery. Yet, the action all takes place within an experimental ward, referred to by the characters as Emerald City. This highly disturbing program follows the experiences of the inmates, who include a cannibal, a Nation of Islam minister, a white power redneck, a slick Irish con man, and a slew of some of the most captivating characters to have ever graced the TV screen. Girl Zines: Voices of a Revolution

By Laura Barcella
Collegian Staff

A Girl's Guide to Taking Over the World: Writings from the Girl Zine Revolution edited by Karen Green and Tristan Taormino
St. Martin's Griffin

If any of you girls out there still don't know what a zine is, please allow me to explain. The term "zine" is short for "fanzine," a self–published mini–magazine of whatever the creator wishes to print. The content, format and style of a zine are in the hands of the creator— they can be one page or 50 pages, handwritten, typed, scrawled, with color, black and white, on glossy pages, or plain old xeroxed pages.

A zine is whatever its creator wants it to be. It can serve any purpose and cover any multitude of topics. An author can make a zine like a literary magazine, full of creative writing and poetry, or a zine can be full of essays, rants, reviews, whatnot... But a zine is almost always very personal, containing writing dear to the heart of the creator. Reading a zine is often like taking a peek into the insides of a person.

A zine can do anything and be anything. It is all up to you. There you have the incredible appeal of zine–making: the ultimate freedom of self–expression, the thrill of creation, the joy of knowing people will hear what you have to say. Writing a zine is like playing God. Printing your thoughts, feelings, fears and desires. Putting yourself on paper. Making yourself open and vulnerable for all to see.

It's virtually impossible to do a zine for profit, and hard enough just to break even. This is because it can be difficult to distribute a zine, and there usually aren't many people willing to shell out money for a little booklet full of strange writing by someone they've never heard of. Thus, it is common for zine–makers to hand out their zines for free, or to sell them for very cheap prices (usually under or around two dollars).

Zine–makers do it solely out of passion, for pleasure. It is fun, creative, liberating, stress and anger–relieving— and a hell of a lot of work. (I did a zine called Oblivion in high school.) Still, it's worth it.

Now that I've preached the benefits of doing a zine, let me get to my review of this fine, recently published book about the girl–world of zines. Writings from the Girl Zine Revolution is a great book. It's a compilation of excerpts and artwork from zines by girls across the country.

Divided into seven chapters, it provides voices of different girls writing on a wide range of subjects. It spans from universal issues like high school trauma, sexual awakenings, self–image, family relations, and idols; to the darker aspects of young women's lives and consciousness: rape, incest, depression, self–hatred, mental illness and how it feels to work as a stripper. As a whole, these voices are strong, powerful and sharp. Individually, each voice resonates with feeling, be it anger, sadness, hate, rage, or love. Call these girls anything you want (I doubt they would care), but you could never say they're not taking care of themselves, being super–creative and living on their own terms.

The voices of the girls in this book come from all over— there are girls of all different backgrounds, ethnicities and sexual orientations. The zines excerpted are as unique and expansive in title as they are in content. With sarcastic titles like Bust, Easy, BratGirl, Alien, SourPuss, Cupsize, FatGirl and Princess Charming, the writers behind the zines make you look—and laugh—twice. Honestly, how could you not want to delve inside something called Not Your Bitch?

The editors and writers of these zines are not quiet girls. No, I don't know them beyond their words on paper, but that's enough for me to see that they're not laying back doing nothing while the world happens around them. They are not "victims," "passive" or "average." They may be hurt, depressed, even abused, but by speaking their own truths they let the world know that we are not deaf, blind or mute. They are taking ownership of their own lives and feelings and putting them out there for all to see, enjoy, resent, or scoff at.

The girls within the book are brave risk–takers. They are creators, and their voices are loud and clear. I dare you not to listen. I also dare you not to walk away from this book changed in some way.

Upon finishing the book, I felt stronger, more frustrated, and closer to my fellow girls and women. I felt proud to be a girl, and proud to be associated with girls as strong as these.

It also made me ashamed of the way I sometimes treat other girls. Ashamed that I judge and envy other girls based on appearances, ashamed that I have insulted other girls because of the way they look or the way they choose to dress. Ashamed of the harm done by such pettiness. Because not only does it harm the woman I'm judging or insulting, it harms all of us. It keeps us where society wants and expects us to be, in constant competition. It keeps us tied down.

As expressed in the book, loving your fellow women does not equal hating men. We can value and appreciate one another's strength, wisdom, and creativity without de– valuing men's. It is possible. No, I haven't fully learned how to do it, but I'm trying to begin. I don't want to feel alienated from other girls anymore. I want to stop acting out of insecurity and jealousy. I want to stop doing what's expected of me, as so many girls in this fantastic book have learned to do for themselves.

Hill sparks thought about harassment

Kelly Parent

After Anita Hill spoke last Thursday evening at Mount Holyoke College, I wondered, as I was standing in the long line to get my book signed, why she didn't address the issue of sexual harassment more. After all, it was Anita Hill, the woman whose name is nearly synonymous with speaking up against harassment. With her courage she has set an example for other women to speak out about this issue.

Ms. Hill was an eloquent speaker, and her presence was warm. I was honored to shake her hand, but I couldn't help being disappointed after her brief, 50–minute speech. She spoke mostly about her new memoir, Speaking Truth to Power. I think the issue that should have been discussed in greater detail is sexual harassment, a problem still prevalent for women in the workplace and the classroom.

Is college not the time when women should be educated about living and working in "the real world?"

Sexual harassment on its own is difficult to endure. It becomes harder still with the repercussions a woman must face when she speaks out against it. Wasn't it enough that Hill had to listen to Judge Thomas tell stories about films involving rape scenes and women having sex with animals? Wasn't it enough that she was accused of lying during the trial, her credibility and integrity constantly questioned? Of course that was not enough. The threats kept coming, including an attempt to burn down her house. Death threats to Hill are still occurring today.

Are people not yet aware of the emotional consequences sexual harassment can have on a woman (or a man, for that matter)? Feelings of depression, anxiety, shame, guilt, betrayal, insecurity and powerlessness are some of the effects that touch the lives of 40 to 60 percent of the people. 99 percent of the victims are female.

Hill was compelled to quit her job because of the effects of speaking out against her own sexual harassment. Ridiculously, women are often blamed for the harassment they suffer. How many times have you heard that a woman was "asking for it" because she was wearing a short skirt? Or that a woman invented her claims of harassment to get back at an employer for turning her down, as was implied during Hill's trial? People who say such things probably don't know that according to statistics, only one percent of harassment allegations are false.

I know that there was a time when women were taught to just accept the harassment, that it was an "unavoidable" part of being a working woman (remember the image of the male boss chasing his female secretary around the desk?). In 1997, you would think people would be more educated about the issue. Think again!

We need to take the power back into our own hands, as Anita Hill did six years ago by having zero tolerance for harassment. There is no room for it in the workplace, the classroom or anywhere. Those days of quietly accepting it are over.

Holyoke shelter to host October rally

by Laura Barcella
Collegian Staff

On Saturday, Oct. 18, the Holyoke organization Womanshelter/Compañeras will be hosting a rally in recognition of Domestic Violence Awareness Month. Guest speakers will include a representative from the Holyoke mayor's office, the Hampden County district attorney's office, and representatives from area organizations dealing with domestic violence.

There will be music, refreshments and activities for children, along with a reading of the names of victims of domestic violence. Their loved ones are encouraged to bring personal belongings to be set at the table to honor victims' memories and to remind us of the fatalities of domestic violence.

Each year, four million women and children are victims of domestic violence. Their deaths create a void, leaving an empty space at the table.

Edith Jennings, from Womanshelter/Compañeras, says she hopes for "a good crowd" of more than 100 people to attend the rally. To spread the word, she sent out thousands of fliers with details about the event, which will be the first of its kind for the organization.

Womanshelter/Compañeras has been active in Holyoke for 17 years. It offers a large variety of services for the local women's community. The organization offers a 24–hour emergency hotline, an emergency shelter for the abused, a community education program, a legal advocacy program, support groups, safety planning, referrals and bilingual/bicultural services.

The shelter assists over 350 women a year on its own, and many more use the other resources provided there.

In parting, Jennings says, "We hope that people will come."

The rally will be held on Saturday, Oct. 18, from 2:30 to 4:30 p.m. at Holyoke Heritage State Park. 221 Appleton St., Holyoke, Mass. For more information, call Edie Jennings at (413) 538–9717 or Heather Warner at (413) 534–2186.

Can't we handle our own accidents?

Laura Barcella

Usually, "20/20" has little to offer me. Hugh "Fishface" Downs and Barbara Wa–Wa engaging in conservative banter about topics they clearly do not care for is hardly my idea of worthwhile prime time. However, this Friday night's edition gave me reason to endure this depressing pre–mortem duo.

The focus of the segment was insurance scams used by lowlife scum on the road. There is a calculated method by which an innocent driver is forced into an accident where she is technically held liable. The plan is, Scum #1 is in a car in front of you, usually with a couple of other passengers. Scum #2 approaches from the side and cuts off Scum #1, causing him or her to slam on the brakes, thus forcing you to hit from behind.

Like bad British comedy, Scum #1 and passengers pour out of the car with great wailing and gnashing of the teeth, holding their necks with insurance dollars flashing in their eyes. Now, our point of interest lays within the specific targets of these heathens.

As Fishface and Wa–Wa eloquently stated in the show, the selected targets of such money–grubbing malice are usually women. Why? Because, of course, women are less likely to put up a fight. You know the hysterical, whiny, needlessly clueless creatures women are— in disastrous or nerve–wracking situations, our minds just fly out the window! Suddenly rendered stupid and speechless, poor fragile women are the victims of such heartless ploys! Dear God, not our dear little women!

Yes, I am full of sarcasm, as usual. It just amuses me to some degree. Mind you, I don't find it funny that women are being targeted as the "victims" of some mean idiots' materialistic scamming. I find it amusing that these scammers think we're so innocent, doe–eyed and stupid. Pardon, when did I give you that idea?

Heaven knows, if someone tried to convince me that hitting some moron was my fault, I'd get out of the car and set all hell breaking loose. I'd be yelling and name–calling at the top of my lungs. I'd certainly not be crying in mute hysterics, but I would be threatening and accusing in a deserved fit of rage. It doesn't take a genius to stand up for yourself, defend yourself and to not let the scum of the world grind their boots all over you.

Some women, I have observed, purposely adopt the meek, weak, hysterical stance in accident situations (and other driving–related incidents, like getting pulled over by a cop) to avoid being held liable for their actions. They think they can get away with murder if they look utterly sweet, scared and bewildered. Unfortunately, in some cases this works, and fine actresses may get off the hook.

However, in the calculated accident scenario we are presently discussing, that type of behavior is exactly what is desired of the woman, and she will be let off no such hook. In fact, she has walked right into their trap, and the joke is on her. As you see, it doesn't pay to behave in this mindless manner, because you never know when you could be getting played.

Of course, I have been in a few minor accidents in my time, and I understand that getting in an accident— even a small one— can be alarming and nerve–wracking. Frankly, my first impulse in such a situation is to put the pedal to the medal and careen myself home at high speeds to a hot waiting cup of caffeinated tea.

Yet I know such escape would be socially and morally unacceptable, so I try to stick around after hitting or being hit in an automobile. Sure, sometimes I freeze up or get short of breath momentarily, but within minutes I wrap my wits back around me and handle what needs to be handled. No whining, doe eyes, or hysterics in sight. So though I may, doubtfully, be a target for one of those scammers one day, I will never be a victim. They won't get what they're looking for!

Another frat rant

Sissy Andrews

Hello fellow sisteren. Welcome back to UMass for another grueling semester of inane lecture and speculation. These first few weeks have produced academic fondness equivalent to that of oral surgery, so by Thanksgiving I should be ready for the reinforced leather restraints.

My one salvation is the neighbor's cat, whom I kidnap for approximately three hours daily around prime time. His name is now BuzzheyBear. Today the poor cat was accosted and violently removed from his porch, but I greatly needed comfort after a very traumatic experience.

As I was walking toward the Campus Center, I had a nasty encounter with some school spirit. I overheard two young men discussing their plan of action for the upcoming weekend. One of them shrieked to the other (they were walking side by side),"Dude, let's just chill at the house, get some chicks over and get annihilated with a kegger. What else is there to do?"

Needless to say, this induced a headache and that rising metallic taste some of us know all too well. I am currently recovering from the experience with cold Pop Tarts and Smarteez.

Today's incident elicited emotion similar to that expressed in a Ramones song: "Beat the frat, beat the frat, beat the frat with a baseball bat." It should be obvious by now what I am referring to. I don't mean to be judgmental, but I would think the mentality of finding endless humor in flatulence (that's another story altogether), salvation in getting "annihilated" and machismo in sex would have disappeared come time for higher academia... Not so.

I asked someone recently for a legitimate reason for the persisting existence of fraternities. Said individual became increasingly hostile and flustered as he fumbled in vain for a response. I must admit, I smiled.

A friend once told me that tradition was the reason behind the lasting phenomenon. The tradition of what? Relying on alcohol, sex and "brotherhood" for a sense of worth, power and a good time? If any brothers (or sisters) out there wish to enlighten me as to the benefits of the Greek System, please do so immediately, because at this point I don't comprehend.

I do not feel sad because the Greek System seems fundamentally useless, but because I am not within legal means to sterilize its participants via the drinking water, thereby preventing such evils from future generations. Do I have a chip on my shoulder? Perhaps.

Yet what can I do? It would be unfair to both myself and BuzzheyBear's real owners for me to barricade myself in my house for the remainder of the semester. I suppose I can do nothing except distance myself from Frat Row and continue to vent my frustration in forums such as the Women's Issues Page.

Why can't we all just get along?

Janet Benoit

Why is it that our society looks at men and women with such different eyes? People argue that it is because the sexes are different, but do we look differently upon a male kitten or a female kitten, or a male blackbird and a female blackbird?

Unequal treatment between the genders has been around since the tale of Adam and Eve. Although there are obvious physical differences, are there necessarily psychological ones as well?

Society should not criticize men for shopping or trying to look their best, nor should it criticize women for driving an eighteen–wheeler or mowing the lawn. People should be able to do as they wish in today's "democratic" society. They should not be socially frowned upon because of the baseless stereotypes which have been handed down from generation to generation.

A common double–standard among college–aged people is the treatment towards girls and boys who take many different sexual partners. A boy is respected and considered a "stud" for having many sex partners, whereas a girl with similar behavior is called a "slut" and is disrespected by both genders.

Why should a boy be respected for sleeping around? There are the constant threats of STDs and unplanned pregnancy which go along with risky sexual behavior. Plus, whatever happened to the notion of caring about the person you're sleeping with?

It's ironic that for a girl to gain respect, she must refrain from sexual activity, or else she risks being thought of as "cheap" or "easy." Of course, a woman has sexual needs and desires equivalent to a man's, but she is expected not to admit or act on them.

Sexual harassment, especially in the armed forces, is also an issue which has been taken to extremes. Women in the armed forces, just like in any other situation, have a right to report inappropriate sexual advances, comments, or treatment from their fellow servicemen.

Why has our society come to this? Why can't men and women live together under the same guidelines and be treated with the same respect? I would be naive to think people will stop judging and stereotyping. In a perfect world, though, woman, man, black, white, gay and straight could all live and work together without thinking less of the others.

Although we try to pretend that we have advanced enough to all be treated equally, this is certainly not the case. I hope there will be a day when a person's gender, race, or sexual orientation would not be the basis for unfair judgments, but I fear such a day will not come. It would be too easy.

a first crush. "Party of Five" hits all the bases. In addition to the realistic writing, "Party of Five" boasts one of the most talented casts on television. To put it succinctly, this drama is like life — just better looking. A (S.G.)

THIRD ROCK FROM THE SUN
When: 9 p.m., (NBC)
Starring: John Lithgow, Jane Curtain

The true mystery of this bizarre show is how it has won so many awards and so much acclaim. Academy Award winner John Lithgow made the move to television as a neurotic alien, who, with the other three members of his crew, struggles to make sense out of human behavior. Jane Curtain is Lithgow's sexual fascination while the other members of the show are bland and play of jokes about stereotypes and absurd American cultural phenomena; not really all that original or even funny for that matter. D (Adam Levine)

LAW & ORDER
When: 10 p.m. (NBC)
Starring: Sam Waterston, Jerry Orbach

After finally winning an Emmy for best dramatic series and with no cast defections after last season, the oft-forgotten "Law & Order" sits on the brink of being yet another bona fide hit for the Peacock, and it's about time.
Within its unique format of each hour-long episode really being two shows in one — the first 30 minutes are devoted to the cops looking for the criminal, and the last half hour deals with the lawyers — "Law & Order" has been able to explore the two (often conflicting) perspectives to the American justice system; a point of view that has provided consistently thought-provoking storylines. Still, Seinfeld's team of actors consistently provide America with the best copy room chatter this side of Ted Kennedy's glass eyes. A (Marty Keane)

VERONICA'S CLOSET
When: 9:30 p.m., (NBC)
Starring: Kirstie Alley, Kathy Najimy

Kirstie Alley returns to both the network and night that made her famous. The former "Cheers" star now grabs the starring role in "Veronica's Closet" — a show about a former lingerie model running her own company.
The premise's catch? Alley's Veronica Chase is has past her prime, but she is not willing to admit it. And her stubborn attempts to regain her youth and waistline, at least in appearance, and thin on comedy.
Alley's supporting cast — Kathy Najimy, Wallace Langham and Dan Cortese, especially — highlight a supporting cast that really boosts this show's appeal.
According to TV Guide, "This show was designed for Kirstie." But the zealous Alley sometimes trips up her own project. Fortunately for NBC, when Alley is a bit overbearing, her castmates provide a balanced support system. B (Casey Kane)

ABC has a winner with "Sabrina," so why not introduce another magic-type character?
Wrong.
There are several reasons why ABC is plummeting among viewers and "You Wish" would be one of them. First of all, you have a genie in this show — as if we haven't seen this done with Barbara Eden. And given that this male genie is annoyingly grungy and hip, there's a very good chance that audiences will tune out really fast.
And that's not even mentioning Kozak's stiffness or the lame writing. This show will probably be following "Meego" to TV-Land's graveyard in a few short weeks. F (S.G.)

Random thought: Is it me or is every act that comes on after the musical guest's first song a dud or what? This isn't purely a new phenomenon either.
As anyone who saw last Saturday's "Celebrity Jeopardy" can attest to, the venerable Lorne Michaels warhorse is still capable of magic, however brief. Not worth staying in on Saturday nights, but worth throwing a tape in the VCR. B- (Marty Keane)

UMass volleyball squad cruises by Harvard

By Brett Mauser
Collegian Correspondent

After dropping two rather ugly matches at home against two solid Atlantic 10 contenders (URI and Virginia Tech), the UMass volleyball team needed a win. Any win. This win could be against the Pee Wee League All-Stars, as long as the team got back on track and started dominating squads. Fortunately enough, they didn't need to beat up on the Pee Wee League All-Stars to show up somebody.

Last night, at the Curry Hicks Cage, the Minutewomen (9- 7, 4-2 in the A-10) literally "dominated" the Harvard Crimson. Behind Jill Meyers' 18 kills, the Minutewomen beat the Ivy League champs 15-5, 13-15, 15-10, 15-5.

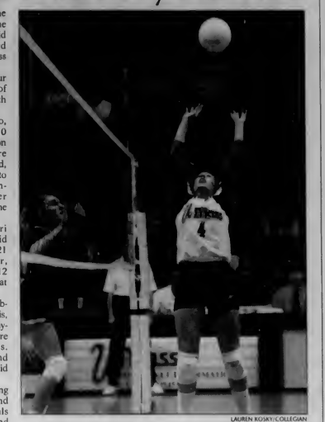
HARVARD	1
MASSACHUSETTS	3

Other than the second set, in which they squandered a 10- 3 lead, the Minutewomen played solid defense and got their attacking game back on track.

Meyers, the sophomore middle blocker, had a standout performance overall, also picking up 11 digs and six blocks along the way. Four of the six blocks were solo to place her one shy of the school's single match record.

Freshman Rebecca Hasson was a sparkplug for UMass, starting in the first match of her collegiate career. She recorded five blocks and only five kills on the night, but was more important defensively.

"What people don't realize in the stands is what Rebecca did defensively for our team. She did a great job putting the block up that channels the ball to the backcourt for the dig. The more she plays, the better she's going to get," said Coach Bonnie Kenny, who inserted Hasson in the lineup in Saturday's loss to the Hokies.



In game one, the score was tied at four when the Minutewomen ran off 11 of the next 12 points, finishing things with a Jennifer Drennan service ace.

After the catastrophe in game two, UMass settled down and posted a 15-10 win, capitalizing on numerous Crimson errors. With the score 10-7 in favor of Harvard, the Minutewomen went to Meyers, who then connected on three of her team-high kills to take the third frame.

Sophomore outside hitter Kari Hogancamp put together another solid performance, picking up 10 kills and 21 digs, while the hitter opposite her, sophomore Sarah Watters, registered 12 kills, including the knockout punch at match point.

"We came out strong, had a few problems in the second game, but the thing is, we're a young team. At times we're playing with no seniors on the floor, so we're going to be inconsistent at times. Overall, I think we played great and should be ready for this weekend," said Meyers.

UMass finishes up their season-long five-match homestand this weekend when they take on conference rivals George Washington Friday night and Fordham on Saturday. Both matches are set for 7 p.m. starts.

number, but I figured that they have Dave Brown as a quarterback and wouldn't have what it takes to stop a potent Dallas stampede. Well, I was wrong. I went nuts and picked the Cardinals. So far, the team down in Phoenix has lost four heartbreakers. I say, if they're going to beat anybody, it may as well be the Vikings. Well, I was wrong. Chicago hosted New Orleans and lost 20-17 in a Sunday night thriller. Is an editorial really needed? Okay, I'll let you do it. Heath Shuler versus Rick Mirer — the battle for who gets the bigger room in the basement — discuss.•So this week, I'm going all out. I'm reaching in for that fire that gave me the sign that allowed me to pick the Jets last year against Arizona and won. That's right, I picked the Jets last year in their one and only victory.Here we go:1. You may think me nuts, but I'm picking Chicago to beat Green Bay in the Windy City. The Pack won't have its fans to jump into and the Bears need a win more than Dan Dierdorf needs an enema. Da Bears 17, Packers 16.

2. On Monday night, the Cowboys will fall. It's a battle between the two top teams in the NFC East, and I'm going with the Redskins, 24-17.

Finally, the Patriots can go 15-1 and it still won't matter. Until they prove that Denver is beatable, there will always be that doubt... that they aren't good enough. Even Dan Shaughnessy is saying that the Pats didn't deserve to go to the Super Bowl last year. It's true, but I still think he's an ass for waiting until now to write it. What would he have said if the Pats had won?

The road to the Super Bowl kicked off last Monday and already the Pats have a flat tire. I don't know if I'd want to play Buffalo with a flat tire.

Horoscopes

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You are likely to receive an offer of sorts today that may have you considering a slight change of plans. The future is bright for you!

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Today, it should be clear to you and others that your methods are certainly valuable. You can explain the details with ease.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — Take the time today to tend to one or two personal issues which may have been on a back burner in favor of more pressing career concerns.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You should be able to diversify and consolidate your efforts with great success today. Do not waste any moment given to you.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — It may be more difficult than expected to get through to someone who is waiting to hear from you. Be sure you're not at cross- purposes.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — It is important that you formulate as complete and detailed a plan as possible at this time. Do not wait until an opportunity is upon you.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You have what it takes to meet a new challenge head–on and succeed, but you must be willing to learn even as you set about your business.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Following in another's footsteps needn't be something you are ashamed of; rather it can prove a valuable means to a cherished end.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — What appears easy today is likely to be just that, but there may be some hidden risks that you need to prepare for ahead of time.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — After a period of hesitation, it's important that you try to get back up to speed in your primary endeavors today. Pick up the pace!

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — You are in a good position to negotiate – and, very likely, receive almost everything that you want. Be reasonable at all times in your demands.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You may not be able to be front–and–center at all times today, but you can have a lasting impact even when working from the sidelines.

Pats look to rebound vs. Buffalo Bills

By Howard Ulman
Associated Press

FOXBORO, Mass. — Three sacks, two overthrows, one big interception and no victory for Drew Bledsoe.

Don't forget the three tipped passes at the line of scrimmage and numerous throws under pressure as one of the NFL's best quarterbacks had his toughest game of the season against what may be the best team.

The Denver Broncos dominated New England 34-13 Monday night. The Patriots' passing game never clicked against tight coverage and a strong rush.

"I've had plenty of time to think about it and try to figure out what I could have changed," Bledsoe said yesterday. "That was a long flight back. We got back at 8 in the morning and had all day (Tuesday) to worry about it."

Now he has to worry about Bruce Smith, Bryce Paup and Buffalo's stingy pass defense as the Patriots (4-1) try to hang on to the AFC East lead Sunday at home against the Bills (3-2).

"This is a crucial point in the season for us, even though it is only the sixth game," Bledsoe said. "We don't have the luxury of spending time feeling sorry for ourselves."

He had little to feel sorry about before going to Denver. His pass to Ben Coates on Aug. 31 was the first scoring play in the NFL this season. He had eight touchdown passes and no interceptions in his first two games.

He was the league's top-rated quarterback after the second and third weeks and was sacked just three times through his first four games. That total doubled against the Broncos even though they used few blitzes.

And the Patriots hopes for an unbeaten season were crushed. "The guys were shell-shocked," Bledsoe said. "It had been so long since we'd lost a game and I think our expectations... don't take into account what happens if we lose.

"It's not something that we think about and, because of that, after the game guys didn't know what happened, didn't know really how to deal with it."

The 6-foot-5 quarterback still isn't sure how his passes were tipped by linemen, two of them on consecutive plays in the first quarter.

"It hasn't happened to me all year," Bledsoe said. "One time I think I may have stared the receiver down a little bit and, when I do that, it gives the defensive lineman a chance to throw his hands up."

And why did he throw that short pass right at Broncos linebacker John Mobley, who returned the interception 13 yards for a touchdown and a 14-0 first-quarter lead?

Dean Smith leaving UNC

After 36 seasons, the University of North Carolina men's basketball team is looking for a new coach. Dean Smith, the all-time winningest coach in NCAA history is expected to announce at a 2 p.m. press conference that he is stepping down as coach of the Tarheels.

Smith has led UNC to 27 straight NCAA Tournament appearances, including 11 Final Four appearances and national titles in 1982 and 1993. Smith broke the all-time win record for a coach in the NCAA Tournament this past April. Smith leaves North Carolina with a career record of 879–254.

Men's soccer continues A–10 win streak

By Michael Kobylanski
Collegian Staff

It seems that for every Massachusetts mens' soccer game, there is a different hero or heroes who emerge from the woodwork.

Last weekend it was Mike Butler, Ioenal Castma and Todd Fowler who made their presence felt and led the Minutemen to a two-game sweep over Atlantic–10 foes St. Joseph's and Temple.

On Wednesday, Butler and Fowler again stepped to the forefront to lead UMass to a 2–0 win over Rhode Island.

MASSACHUSETTS	2
RHODE ISLAND	0

However, the Minutemen shouldn't be jumping for joy just yet. Or at least head coach Sam Koch doesn't think so.

"We didn't play very well. We struggled, but we worked hard and gutted it out," Koch said. "Todd Fowler played super. He saved our butts today, and Mike Butler scored two nice goals."

"We played well, but we could've played better," Butler said. "We came out pretty much focused on what we needed to do. We just wanted to keep it simple and keep it on the ground."

The Minutemen came out fired up in the opening 25 minutes of the first half. Seth Lilburn, Matt Christy and Castma all had opportunities to score before Butler pounced on a loose ball and deposited it in the back of the Rhode Island net at the 23:10 mark. Castma assisted on Butler's first of two goals on the afternoon.

Butler and Castma nearly hooked up again just over three minutes later, but Rams goalie Anthony Latronica came up with a diving save.

That save turned the tides in the first half, as Rhode Island regrouped and controlled the final 20 minutes of the frame.

Fowler made the first of several outstanding stops on the afternoon at the 26:48 mark, as he robbed Brian Tucker to keep the game in favor of the Minutemen.

The second half began in the same fashion as the first, as UMass came out gunning for the goal. Gavin Hewitt had a pair of scoring opportunities early in the stanza, but was denied on both occasions. Lilburn was then nearly rewarded for his aggressive style of play as he deflected a Latronica clearing attempt. The ball was redirected off of Lilburn and trickled over the head of the Rhode Island keeper and slid just wide of the left post.

The Minutemen continued to pressure the Rams, and were a matter of inches from taking a 2–0 lead. Junior midfielder Paul Corcoran lobbed a ball over the head of Latronica, but the Rams goalie leaped and tipped the ball just over the crossbar.

Rhode Island again picked up the pace in the final 15 minutes of the contest, as Fowler was again called upon to save the day. He started things off by denying Rhody freshman Greg Bironas, diving to his left to tip the ball out of play. Then, on the ensuing corner, Minutemen junior Marc Saad stopped a Rams shot before it crossed the goal line. Fowler then shut down another threat with 12 minutes left, making a great save on Steven DeMoura.

Fowler, however, then saved the best for last, as he extended himself across the top left corner of the net to rob Tucker again and keep the game at 1–0.

Butler then put the finishing touches on the contest at the 80:19 mark, as he converted on a URI giveaway to seal the deal for the Minutemen.

"We certainly had our chances today. We were putting them under pressure all day, but we just didn't finish the chances," Koch said. "And their goalkeeper also made some nice saves."

"We just couldn't get it out today. The ball wasn't bouncing our way some times today, but we just wanted it more than they did," Fowler said. "(In the last 15 minutes) I was just trying to stay calm. It's nice to get the shutout."

One of the things that Koch attributed to the sub-par performance was the fact that James Redmond and Eric Rabinovitz were not at 100 percent.

"With James and Eric not at full strength, that hurt us. It definitely affected the way we played," Koch said. "They are two players that make a difference in our play."

Minutemen Notes: With his two goals in the afternoon, Butler now has 20 points (8g, 4a) on the season. Fowler now boasts a 2–1 mark between the pipes with a goals against average well under 1 this year. Wednesday's win was also a sweet measure of revenge for the Minutemen, who suffered a tough late season loss last season to the Rams which snuffed out any post season hopes. UMass is currently 3–0 on a five game Atlantic–10 homestand. Next up for the Minutemen will be games against Virginia Tech on Friday at 3:30 p.m., and George Washington on Sunday afternoon at 1 p.m. Both games are at Totman Field.

Massachusetts field hockey falls to Terriers, 3–0

By Casey Kane
Collegian Staff

BOSTON — It would have been easy for them to give up. It would have been easy to just go through the motions, to pack it in essentially.

Considering what the Massachusetts field hockey team went through at the hands of North Carolina and Wake Forest last weekend, the half-hearted effort last night at Boston University would have been understandable.

But despite a focused and complete effort from the Minutewomen (5–7), the Terriers (6–4) walked away with a 3–0 victory.

Massachusetts	0
Boston University	3

"The hardest thing to do after loses like last weekend is to come out and have confidence in yourself and your teammates," UMass coach Patty Shea said, "When teams take you to school like that you tend to become a doubter. But they came back strong and ready to play and that shows character."

Saying the BU win was the result of the effort put forth by senior Sharon Eises would diminish the rest of her team's play. However, Eises was responsible for two Terrier goals and a number of key defensive plays.

"She stopped a lot of balls and she made key plays when BU needed them," Shea said," When she was back on defense, and the pressure was on us, we got caught going right at her."

With 6:11 remaining in the first half, Eises controlled the ball off a penalty corner and found the back of the UMass cage.

The BU back struck again for the Terriers' third goal. An offensive rush to the UMass goal resulted in a BU penalty stroke after Minutewoman goalie Zowie Tucker covered the ball. Eises made the shot at knee level on Tucker's left side with 10:33 left in the game.

Boston University's second goal came during a scramble in the UMass circle after a penalty corner. Jaclyn Mele took the ball from Kimberly Kos and Danielle DeCoste and worked past Tucker for the score.

UMass came within striking distance of the Terrier goal several times, but failed to convert those opportunities into chances.

The major difference in the game, according to Shea, was penalty corners.

"Penalty corners changed the game," Shea said. "It's such a specific part of the game, anything can throw it off, you can hit a seam, the ball can spin differently and it all throws the timing off we had our opportunities, we just couldn't finish them tonight."

Another factor was that neither team could sustain the game's momentum for very long.

"It's tough to play 70 minutes at a high, high tempo," Shea said. "It's even tougher to keep the momentum for those 70 minutes."

The Minutewomen are on the road this weekend where they will face Ball State and Syracuse in Syracuse.

Patriots go down; Chicago has to win

I said it.

Two weeks ago, in this very column. I said it.

I predicted that if New England played against Denver the way they played against New York and Chicago, then the Broncos would walk all over them.

Sure, last week I turned myself around and predicted the Pats would win 31–20. Give me a break. I went with my heart. Considering the status of my love life my heart was probably getting even with me.

Well, the Broncos ran all over the Patriots. Namely Terrell Davis, who once again proved the No. 3 Patriots defense ineffectual. The 34–13 thrashing is now a symbol of the inequality of these two teams. The Patriots are now a distant second in the AFC.

Let's go over the reasons why the

Jonathan M. Place on the NFL

Patriots lost. (There are only a few):

1. Penalties — 10 for 117 yards.

This needs no editorial. The only props I'll ever send to Bill Parcells is that he kept this very young, inexperienced team disciplined.

2. Running game — 51 total rushing yards.

Curtis Martin recorded 66 yards on 15 carries. Hey, but who needs a running game with a passing attack like New England has. Right? Whoever makes comments like that should stick to watching college football and refrain from commenting on the stuff they don't understand. The NFL requires a complete package. The NFL don't need no stinkin poll.

3. Defense — I'm sorry boys, you failed Monday. Remember the third quarter when you guys were digging your feet into your own end zone in a goal line stance, expecting Davis to get the handoff. Hey linemen, don't forget about one of the best scrambling QB's in the last decade. John Elway walked right in for the one yard touchdown.

The one Patriot I won't put blame on is Bledsoe. Both quarterbacks from Monday night's match-up had rough nights, statistically speaking. However, Bledsoe did look better than Elway. How many passes did Shawn Jefferson miss? I forget. Drew will still remain at the top of the AFC in QB rating. But then again, the Pats lost, so who gives a damn.

In other NFL news:

I'm 54–28.

That's my record this season for picking all the NFL games. No spread, no over–under, just "who is going to win?" Since starting out the year 12–3, I've been batting around .600. If I keep on picking 'em like this. I'm en route to shattering last year's mark of 149 correct picks with 153. Yahoo!

This past weekend, I went 8–5, failing to see the light in games like the Dallas–New York, Minnesota–Arizona, and New Orleans–Chicago match–ups. I also fumbled on the San Diego–Oakland game. The Raiders really suck. The Giants have the Cowboys tonight," Yarworth said. "But, defense wins games.

"[Last night], I wanted the team focused on defense, and the starters shut [BC] out in the first quarter."

Sophomore goal keeper Richard Huntley continued his maturation into a Championship–level goal tender making a number of key saves in the contest before being relieved late in the third period after allowing only three goals.

"He's comfortable now as the starting keeper. He's got his confidence," Yarworth said.

Troupis leads way as Minutemen drown the Eagles

The smallest man in the pool was bigger than all the Boston College Eagles last night.

The No. 14 Massachusetts men's water polo team benefitted from a four–point first quarter outburst by Timmy Troupis and coasted to a deceivingly close 17–10 victory over BC.

"Timmy's a spark plug," said UMass coach Russ Yarworth of his diminutive sophomore who is generously listed at 5– feet 9–inches and 165 pounds. "He's a little guy, but he sure knows the game; he's got probably more experience than anyone on the team."

Troupis — the Minutemen's second leading scorer — exploded for a pair of goals and a two–point score in the first frame in which UMass (14–4, 5–2 Collegiate Water Polo Association) blanked the Eagles, 4–0.

Boston College	10
Massachusetts	17

Playing an increased role in his second season with the Minutemen, Troupis (a native of Athens, Greece) has tallied 17 goals and a pair of two–pointers on the season. He has added a team–best 18 assists on a team that has struggled offensively of late.

The young Eagles were just what the sputtering UMass offense needed to break out of its funk and gain confidence before the stretch drive of its regular season schedule which includes the annual trip to California.

Brian Stahl, who has been battling through a shoulder injury, broke out last night with a superb all–around performance to put away any notion BC had of a comeback after the first quarter.

"Brian's being the best polo player he can be right now, he's been great for the team," Yarworth said.

The junior sniper scored a pair of goals, two two–pointers, and assisted on a couple other scores. He had three points and an assist in the third quarter when the Minutemen outscored the Eagles, 7–2.

"The offense Isn't as potent right now — I mean, we unloaded a little

Students, faculty respond to alcohol ban

Administrators praise Scott; prevention, help top priority

McGuirk tailgating now dry

By Leigh Faulkner
Collegian Staff

As drinking issues are slowly being addressed by administrators, faculty and staff at the University of Massachusetts, many students have mixed opinions about the extent of drinking problems on campus.

Sandra Whitcomb of Residential Education Alcohol Program (REAP) and Health Educator Sally Damon from University Health Services both agree it is necesarry for Chancellor David K. Scott to deal with issues surrounding alcohol on campus.

"I applaud him. I think UMass needs to look at the drinking that goes on this campus," said Whitcomb in reference to Chancellor David K. Scott's decision to re- examine alcohol policies on campus.

Scott appointed Associate Chancellor Susan Pearson to head the task force, and said that the other members will be appointed by next Thursday.

"I feel like things are out of control this semester. It is really sad what has been happening on campus, the incidents at tailgating and Hobart [Lane] as well as Adam Prentice's death," Damon said.

"The University should sponsor more events to increase student involvement if they want to decrease drinking," Damon said.

Whitcomb works with students who get arrested and come to REAP through a court–mandated program.

In addition she also deals with students who get in trouble in their residence halls.

Students who live on campus are usually underage, while students who come through the courts are typically older.

"Students have gotten arrested for fighting, vandalism, assaults, breaking and entering. There are some pretty serious charges going on around here," Whitcomb said. "I think it is good that some students get into trouble before they hurt themselves or someone else."

Whitcomb said while there is a drinking problem on campus and many students do get themselves into trouble with alcohol, it is not just a problem for colleges and universities.

"People are drinking at a younger age. Many students come to campus with well established drinking problems," she said. "Binge drinking is normalized in our environment."

Because of this Whitcomb explained that it is important for everyone involved in a student's life to take responsibly for alcohol issues, including the students.

Damon referred to a survey conducted in November 1996 by Project Pulse, a University research group.

Out of 470 students surveyed, 44% described themselves as light drinkers and 42% said they were moderate drinkers.

"I am not sure if binge drinking is increasing or if it has to do with students who call themselves heavy drinkers are drinking even more," she said. "I do think that students are more education on alcohol emergencies than in the past."

The way the University needs to deal with alcohol issues is "multi–faceted, through education, enforcement and intervention," Whitcomb said.

"Students need to take a look at the role alcohol plays in their social Chancellor David K. Scott discussed his decision to ban the consumption of alcohol during tailgating at football games at yesterday's Faculty Senate meeting.

Scott said that his personal observations of tailgating at this year's Homecoming game, held on September 27, and the death of junior Adam G. Prentice — whose blood alcohol level was above the legal limit at the time of his fatal fall on the same day — led him to re–impose a ban which had been lifted on a trial basis in September 1992.

"Some very bad things happened during Homecoming," Scott said. "One, of course, was the terribly tragic death of one of our students, in which alcohol was probably a significant factor.

"I had observed that tailgating at the football game was a disaster waiting to happen... and so I have decided to discontinue the experiment where tailgating was allowed as a waiver of our policy against consumption of alcohol in open spaces. This experiment has been a failure, and it will be discontinued, starting October 25."

Scott said that in addition to excessive consumption of alcohol at the Homecoming game and the death of Prentice, other events, "regionally and nationally," involving alcohol, as well as a recent campus study which showed a significant increase in the percentage of students who engage in binge drinking, led him to establish a task force to examine the University's alcohol policies.

"A week ago, we put in place the creation of a task force to review all of our policies on alcohol," Scott said. "I want them to meet soon, and I want their recommendations in six weeks."

Scott said that the task force, who will be headed by Associate Chancellor Susan Pearson and whose other members will be announced by next Thursday, will look at a variety of issues, including extending the University's jurisdiction off campus for alcohol policies.

"We will ask them to look at all kinds of things," Scott said. "We will ask them to look at advertising that runs in the Massachusetts Daily Collegian and we will ask them to look into extending the University's jurisdiction off campus."

Scott said that the University has a right to extend its jurisdiction off campus "for those situations where student behavior would significantly impact the University community."

"It is my view that the use of alcohol and what happens after parties in town, on the way back to campus, clearly effects the health and safety of members of the University,"

CHRISTOPHER A. CESNEK/ COLLEGIAN

Stanley Rosenberg speaks at the Faculty Senate meeting yesterday.

Scott said. "If we can not extend our jurisdiction for this issue, I can't imagine where it could be extended."

Scott also informed the Senate of a proposal by James F. Carlin, chair of the Board of Higher Education, to ban alcohol entirely at Massachusetts state colleges.

The Associated Press reported that Carlin's suggestion has the support of all nine of the presidents of the four–year colleges in the state, and could be in place by the end of the year.

The ban, which would not apply to on–campus pubs, would have to be approved by the Board of Higher Education and by the trustees of each college before it could go into effect.

No such proposal has been made for the University of Massachusetts, and Scott said that he did not feel banning alcohol entirely would be a productive step for the campus.

U.S. to restrict food aid to North Korea

WASHINGTON (AP) — The United States will suspend food aid to North Korea unless the communist government permits wider monitoring of distribution to nurseries, kindergartens and hospitals, an official with the Agency for International Development warned yesterday.

Some 2.6 million children under the age of 6, patients and workers in special programs to counter disasters are helped in an international program to which the United States this year contributed 177,000 metric tons of grain.

While there is no evidence American corn, rice and other food aid is being diverted to North Korea's military or stolen, international relief monitors do not have access to areas in the north and the center of the country, officials said.

The Word Food Program, which is providing 330,000 metric tons overall, has asked North Korea to permit 17 monitors to oversee distribution, but only seven have been approved.

While China, which is providing 150,000 tons of food, does not insist on monitoring, the United States does, and it has not permitted its contributions to go into fenced-off areas.

Jury awards victims in Eddie Bauer case

GREENBELT, Md. (AP) — A federal jury awarded $1 million yesterday to three young black men who accused the Eddie Bauer chain of "consumer racism" for detaining them on suspicion of shoplifting and forcing one man to take off his shirt.

The jury of four whites and three blacks found that the young men were falsely imprisoned and defamed by store officials and that the outdoor-clothing company negligently supervised its security guards.

However, the jury did not find that the civil rights of 18-year-old Alonzo Jackson were violated by being forced to remove his shirt.

The jury deliberated seven hours over two days before awarding Jackson $850,000 in compensatory and punitive damages. His friends, Rasheed Plummer, 18, and Marco Cunningham, 20, each were awarded $75,000.

They had sought $85 million.

"I'm happy we won but it doesn't give you your dignity back," Jackson said outside the courthouse.

Eddie Bauer attorney Gerald Ivey said the company was "gratified there was no finding of racial discrimination." Blacks who have long fought discrimination in the workplace are increasingly taking their complaints of unfair treatment to the doors of corporate America — as consumers.

Reich addresses UM community

Robert E. Reich speaks about American economics yesterday in Mahar Auditorium.

By Ken Tatro
Collegoin Correspondent

Former Secretary of Labor Robert B. Reich spoke about the American economy and the "American Social Compact" at University of Massachusetts' Mahar Auditorium yesterday.

In his lecture entitled, "The American Social Compact," Reich said although the economy is doing well, median wages have remained stagnant.

According to Reich, when adjusted for inflation, the median income has not increased since 1989.

"The median worker is nowhere compared to other times of recovery," Reich said.

The decrease of health plans, benefits and pensions has further contributed to the widening inequality in American society Reich said.

According to Reich, American consumers are confident because they expect to be earning more money in the future, but they are not, and consumer debt is only going to continue to increase.

Reich, who served as Labor Secretary during President Clinton's first term, discussed what he called the "American Social Compact."

"The American Social Compact is a set of understandings and principles as to what we, as part of society, owe each other," Reich said.

Reich said that 30 years ago a profitable American company would not lay off workers, but for the past 15 years profitable American companies have been laying off a large number of workers, and are breaking the social compact.

Social Security and Medicare are also part of this social compact. Reich said that the actual dangers for these programs are minimal, and that only very small changes are needed to help these programs.

"There is no need to privatize these programs," Reich

National Coming Out Day GLBT rally held yesterday

By Sarah J. Kimmel
Collegian Staff

In honor of National Coming Out Day, a rally which brought together the gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgender (GLBT) community and their allies was held on the Student Union steps yesterday.

The rally was a way for members of the GLBT community who have come out of the closet to share their stories and support individuals who are working to proclaim their sexuality.

The rally was organized by University of Massachusetts' students Chad Rippere and Melissa Grant. Although the actual National Coming Out Day tomorrow, the duo decided to hold the rally yesterday due to the long weekend.

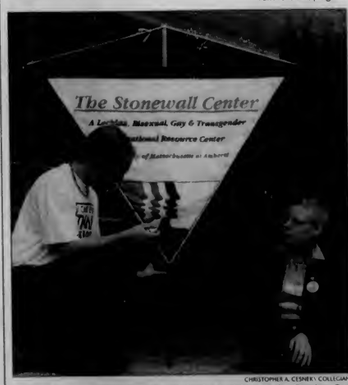
Speakers not only told their stories, they also discussed barriers that they had to overcome, and how they can remove present barriers for those who have not yet come out.

Ashavan Doyon, one of the speakers, said

"I think it's important that we all gather at least once a year to really be proud of the fact that we're out," speaker Ashavan Doyon said. "I didn't have an easy coming out experience by any means.

"I think it's important for all of us who are out to be very active as role models... for those who can be, it's very important that we be as out as we can so that we have role models and so that upcoming youth have role models."

The surrounding ralliers responded with the chanting of, "We're here, we're queer, we're fabulous, don't f—k with us!"



Other supporters, like Matt Libby, addressed the issue of homophobia.

"National Coming Out Week is an opportunity for students like myself to speak openly about our community," Libby said. "This rally allows our visibility to be acknowledged as a vibrant part of the University. My focus of this is to emphasize the importance of an alliance.

"Whether it be heterosexual, bisexual, gay, lesbian or transgender students who are eliminating discrimination together... Only by speaking against homophobia will we begin to conquer it."

Graduate student Pam Eisner, who came out of the closet at 31 years of age said, "Don't wait, just jump right out of that closet, sit in the living room, put your feet up on the coffee table and live your life in the most full way that you can."

Eisner is an affiliate of the Stonewall Center, which is located in Crampton Residence Hall in Southwest. The

Riki Anne Wilchins promotes new book on transsexual cause

By Rachael Pepe

Urging people to donate their time to the fight for transsexual causes, Riki Anne Wilchins spoke about her personal experiences and read excerpts from her new book, Read My Lips: Sexual Subversion and the End of Gender.

Wilchins, co–founder of Transsexual Menace (a political organization), told listeners that it's easy to fight a struggle for yourself, but there is a need to work on a larger social agenda.

"A lot of people are being oppressed because of gender variance," said the Executive Director of GenderPAC, an organization which frequently lobbies Capital Hill on issue's such as hate crimes.

"Identity politics forces you to sell yourself in some way," Wilchins said, "but GenderPAC doesn't do that."

One of the most prominent writers on the transgender scene, Wilchins spoke from her book with sarcasm and outrage, expressing her own fears and experiences behind living as a transsexual.

"I've always been trapped in a sort of 'cul–de–sac,' with people constantly asking me if I was a man or a woman," the author said.

"These questions require me to justify myself," Wilchins said. "[Justification] is absent in my book."

She said that she doesn't want to justify or label herself.

The GenderPAC also works with trying to educate people about Intersexual Genital Mutilation (IGM), according to Wilchins.

"IGM went straight to the top because it affects so many people and no one else is working on it," Wilchins said.

Wilchins said that people assume IGM affects only

Dangers of space probe discussed by Grossman

By Jason Eiseman
Collegian Correspondent

On Monday, October 13, NASA is planning to launch the Cassini space probe, which is carrying 72.5 pounds of plutonium 238. On Tuesday night Dr. Karl Grossman spoke at the University of Massachusetts Student Union Ballroom concerning the dangers of this mission.

While there is a danger of radiation leakage during take-off, Grossman said he was even more concerned with NASA's dangerous "slingshot maneuver." NASA is planning to "send it to Venus, go around twice and slingshot past the Earth in 1999," Grossman said. This maneuver is not new, it is the same procedure used for the Galileo space probe.

"Pounds of plutonium, over five years, will slowly rain down on the planet," said Grossman about what will happen if the Earth flyby fails.

The Cassini project is also not the first time nuclear material has been brought to space. According to Grossman, the United States has sent nuclear material on board space flights 26 times, with three mishaps. According to Grossman, the moon devastating mishap was in 1964 when the "snap 9–A mission disintegrated 2.1

llves... everyone has a role in dealing with this issue and we all need to figure out what our roles are. We need to be balanced everyone need to do something to fix this problem, we can't point fingers at one another," Whitcomb said.

"Drinking on campus is reflective of societies attitude towards it. Drinking is fun, it gives a whole new meaning to not being responsible for themselves and actions," Damon said.

However, sophomore Dan McLeod from Butterfield Residence Hall disagrees.

"I don't think students drink excessively. There are probably some people who do, but overall I don't think so," he said.

Through the assigned task force, Whitcomb and Damon said they hope for more resources and intervention, and in addition hold open and honest conversation about what can be done to curb the drinking problem on campus.

Resident Assistants (RAs) hold programs on alcohol awareness but they can only do so much, Whitcomb said.

"Chances are students who need to be at these programs the most aren't there," Whitcomb said.

She explained through her experiences in working with substance abusers is that they need to get themselves in trouble before anyone can work with them to help them

"If the University is going to set policies they need to enforce them, they can't have polices and do nothing about them... Each individual has to moderate their own behavior and be responsible for their actions. Its a joint responsibility," Damon said.

She also stressed groups who want to be part of the solution need to stop being hypocritical.

"It is important for students to find the hypocrisies on campus and point them out," said Damon, referring to the fact that several of the Collegian's advertisements are alcohol-related.

"People can't be saying that drinking has to change and then not do anything to help that change. Many college newspapers refuse to run alcohol ads," Damon said.

"I do not believe that is the best solution for this campus," Scott said. "It will just push drinking back into town."

Faculty Senate President John Bracey announced that the Rules Committee of the Senate was working on a statement on the issue as well, and would be presenting that statement to the Senate for approval in the coming weeks.

Student Government President Lia Wong also announced her intention to serve on the alcohol task force.

In other Senate business, Provost Cora Marret announced that Stanley Koplik, the chancellor of the Board of Higher Education, has recommended the approval of $380,000 in one-time funding for steps towards the creation of a Commonwealth (Honors) College at UMass Amherst.

Marret said the recommendation, which was expected to be approved by the Board yesterday, would include $300,000 for the upgrading of computers in the existing Honors Program computer lab in Goodell, $30,000 for the creation of a post-graduate opportunities office, and $40,000 for planning of the Commonwealth College.

The recommendation also includes funding for an Undergraduate Research Conference to be held in April 1998 and a system-wide faculty conference on the creation of honors classes.

State Senator Stanley Rosenberg and State Representative Ellen Story also addressed the Senate yesterday, and warned members that the relatively high budgets the University has received from the state in the past six years will make it more difficult for the University to obtain funding from the State Legislature in coming years.

Rosenberg also said that the multi-billion dollar Central Artery Project, as well as the $400,000 in road work slated to take place in the state in the next seven years, will make it difficult to obtain capital funding for the University.

Story encouraged the faculty and students to initiate a grassroots campaign across the state to raise support for funding maintenance work on the University campus.

Author Rikki Anne Wilchins discusses her new book in the Campus Center yesterday.

Third World women and children, and they do not realize it is happening right here with American children.

Five or six children are admitted to hospitals each day because they are in the process of or have had IGM for some reason or another, according to Wilchins.

"This is known as Gender Identity Disorder, and it is about children not knowing what or who they are," Wilchins said.

"However," Wilchins said, "we are making enormously good progress these last few years."

Wilchins ended the presentation by suggesting that people call her or the GenderPAC to voice their opinions and help get the message out.

She also signed copies of her new book, which were available at the presentation due to the co-sponsoring of the Food For Thought bookstore.

said.

But, according to Reich, "The Social Compact is fraying," and American society is becoming a two-tier society divided by income.

"In a democratic society we can't have a two-tiered society," Reich said. According to Reich, once the economy slows down American society must make one of two choices.

One choice the American public could choose is the politics of resentment, when people channel their anger in forms of xenophobia, nationalism and isolationism, Reich said.

The other choice is "progressive politics" where "we as a nation redefine what it means to have a social compact," Reich said.

"The choice between resentment or progressive politics is on which we will make as a people," Reich said.

pounds of plutonium". Grossman said that radioactive material from that flight was found on every continent in the world, and can be linked to increased cancer rates.

Grossman also said that the famed Apollo 13 mission was bringing plutonium to the moon, and was forced to drop the plutonium off the coast of New Zealand, for fear that it would disintegrate in the atmosphere. "You didn't see this in the movie," Grossman said.

Grossman called plutonium 238, "the most toxic substance known. One pound of plutonium, hypothetically, could kill everyone on the planet," Grossman said.

Grossman began his lecture by passing out two documents to approximately 50 people who filled the seats. Both documents were pulled from the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's Final Environmental Impact Statement for the Cassini Mission.

"In the unlikely event that an [earth flyby] inadvertent reentry occurred, approximately 5 billion of the estimated 7 to 8 billion world population at the time of the swingbys could receive 99 percent or more of the radiation exposure," was underlined on the National Aeronautics and Space Administration's Final Environmental Impact Statement handout for the audience.

Grossman said that he first became critical of NASA after the Challenger Shuttle disaster, an event said by NASA to be a one in 100,000 chance. According to Grossman the next mission of the Challenger Shuttle would have carried plutonium on board, which is what pushed him to fight nuclear materials in space.

Grossman brutally criticized NASA.

"This agency is the IRS of the skies," he said. "Bums," he called NASA, "they risk the planet for no good reason. These bastards are out of control."

Grossman said that the military has a definite interest in space, and they believe the future of the military can be found there. Grossman said the military used the terms Space Control, controlling space, and Space Force Application, the control of Earth from space.

One of Grossman's slides showed a picture of the proposed route of the Cassini probe. It was scheduled to launch on Monday, but was postponed for one week. The Cassini probe was scheduled to reach Saturn on June 25, 2004, and flyby Earth on August 19, 1999.

Grossman mentioned that in a quatrain by Nostradamus called, "Terror from the skies," a horrifying event is expected to occur in July 1999. But according to Grossman the Gregorian calendar was not invented until after Nostradamus' death, and Nostradamus had actually predicted this event to occur in August 1999.

Grossman urged students to "act politically." He said students should call congressmen and senators. He believes that if the launch is stopped on Monday, it has a good shot of not going off at all, but if it does he says that people should concentrate on stopping the Earth flyby.

He finished by reading a few sentences from his book, The Wrong Stuff.

"We are on a countdown to nuclear disaster," he read. "We are playing Nuclear Russian roulette with a gun pointed at the Earth."

After the lecture, those who chose to stay participated in a discussion of how to stop the Cassini mission.

Not everyone in attendance agreed with professor Grossman, such as John Wilkinson, a senior physics major, and a former Department of Energy employee.

"These things are dangerous, but not as dangerous as they make them out to be," Wilkinson said. He also called Grossmans' information "incorrect, and exaggerated."

Grossman is a professor of Journalism at the State University of New York at Old Westbury. His award winning documentary "Nukes in Space" is being shown at several community access television stations in Western Massachusetts.

Sunny Miller, program coordinator for Traprock Peace Center and one of the sponsors of the lecture, called professor Grossman a "gatherer of many truths." The other sponsors were the Social Thought and Political Economy program at the University of Massachusetts, and Citizens for Participation in Political Action(CPPAX).

Dangerous Toys

Bryan Schwartzman

Have you ever, in your experience and wisdom, regretted hounding your parents for all those toys years back? Come on, I know I was not satisfied unless I had that last Constructacon Transformer, or a GI Joe Hovercraft to counter my neighbor's Cobra-Hydrafoil.

Seriously, ever wonder about what kind of economic strain toys (action figures, dolls, remote controlled vehicles, video games, etc.) can have on a middle class American family? My father said that "money does not grow on trees." But I do not think many 8-year-olds can grasp this concept.

It is difficult to fault kids for begging their parents for the latest toy fad when the television is telling them to do so! Ten or so years ago, now college-age folks were subject to an advertising bombardment unlike any other directed at children since the invention of television.

Before the 1980's the FCC (Federal Communications Commission) prioritized the quality of children's programming and limited the number of minutes per program which could be devoted to advertising, and forbade the marketing of a product with a children's show.

In 1984 the FCC waved most of these regulations opening programs up to heavy advertising, including advertising for toys. Television executives and toy companies were quick to seize this new opportunity.

"The toy and television industries quickly joined together in determined marketing efforts. Toy manufacturers got into the business of making children's television shows for the first time as they began developing toys and programs as a package," wrote Nancy Carlsson in an article published in Utne Reader back in January 1992.

Sales of toys connected with television doubled between 1980 and 1988. By 1987, 80 percent of children's programming was produced by toy companies.

"Their is a payoff at every level, and it's a practice that needs to be eliminated," said Jeff Chester, Executive Director of The Center for Media Education to Broadcasting and Cable magazine.

Let's take for a given the quality and educational value of shows, but what effect did this radical transformation have on the desires (which is essentially what any advertising seeks to feed) of children?

Although the FCC prohibits marketing a product on a show directly related to that product, the combination of commercials and cartoons were too much for many children to resist. Instead of a toy being a child's diversion, it became a low-level need.

Our parents were seeing commercials of Mickey Mantle's Action Baseball board game and thought it was neat, but probably too expensive. Our parents (and probably older siblings) were not subject to the same types of adds and the same types of toys, which emphasized a specific function. Instead of playing with the bouncing ball and the ping pong paddle for hours, toys produced by companies like Hasbro and Kenner had specific uses which were useful only until the next new toy was introduced.

Instead enhancing the child's imagination, Transformers, GI Joe and Go-Bots,(all very cool toys by the way) dictated to the child what they could play with and what is used for. I know I never mixed and matched two toys, probably because I was trying to re-enact the cartoon's.

So while the child wants more and more toys, there is more and more of a strain on the family to either spend a lot of money or disappoint the child. Most instances, if a parent explains that there is simply not enough money for the new Power Ranger, a child who is not overly spoiled will understand; yet the relationship between toy makers and television is one every family should be aware of. The FCC is constantly investigating the matter, and in 1990 Congress passed a bill which introduced far weaker versions of the pre-Reagan administration regulations. But their is no end in site to this gigantic collaboration.

So remember that one unlucky, sheltered kid in class whose parents restricted or prohibited him from watching television and instead had him read a book? Maybe in some warped way they actually had a point. Sometimes it's better to turn the tube off.

Where have sports gone wrong?

Gerrit Devoung

I'm starting to think sports have become a national epidemic. Anorexic gymnasts, steroid-crazed football players, sexually deranged sportscasters. They all point to one conclusion: our obsession with sports has gone way, way too far.

Granted, sports are fun. Sports develop teamwork, good health and perseverance. But, at least in our country, they also develop a tendency towards aggression, ridiculous levels of competitiveness and arrogance. And what's worse is that, as kids, we'll do anything we can to emulate "heroes."

So where have we gone wrong? What happened to those golden days of backyard baseball and playground soccer? Professionalism. The fact is, sports aren't for us to enjoy anymore. Actually, they aren't for anyone to enjoy. The only people allowed to participate are the professionals. But they're not allowed to have fun. Millions of dollars are on the line.

Even as kids, sports aren't to be enjoyed. Kindergartners are crammed into uniforms, sent onto the field, and yelled at from the sideline by the local barbarian Pele wannabe. The pressure only gets worse as the kids get older. By the fifth or sixth grade many kids can't just join a team. They have to try-out. If memory serves, by third grade, travelling teams are in place for those good enough.

By the time sixth grade rolls around (when kids are a whopping 10 or 11 years old) everybody knows who the athletic haves and have-nots are. And for those of us unlucky enough not to have some rare thyroid malfunction rendering us six-feet-tall and 210-pounds by seventh grade, sports are out of the question.

So, with all our new-found free time, and a gaping hole in our sportless lives, we turn to the next best thing: watching them on TV. We sit through a mind-numbing Sox game, watch the Patriots lose, and when nothing else is on, we'll even suffer through golf. And while we're planted in front of the set, dreaming of what could have been, we stuff ourselves with chips and cheap beer. And people wonder why America is one of the fattest countries on earth.

When you think about it, it's really sad. In high school, for example, rather than licking Frank Football's cleats clean, or smelling Billy Baseball's six-game old jock, we could be, dare I say, living our own lives. But what does that mean? In this day and age of mindless hero-worship, it's harder and harder to discern. But hell, it could be anything: picking up an instrument, weaving straw hats, hanging out with friends, or for those of us unable to relinquish our NBA dreams to reality by playing some pick- up basketball.

Think about how many middle aged guys cram their bulging butts into the Lazy Boy every weekend to watch someone else do what they enjoy. Maybe, if we start now, we can actually live our lives 20 years from now. And maybe if we weren't taught from birth that the only noble aspiration is to kick a ball around, fewer of us would go through the hell of trying to be the next Shaquille O'Neil, when in reality we're meant to be Einstein or Mozart.

I've got nothing against sports (except that I'm no good at them). I do have something, something big, against brainless jock-worship. Donning a helmet, or ridiculous-looking Nikes, doesn't necessarily make someone a hero. To me, the real heros are the people who humbly walk through their day-to-day lives, actually doing what they want to do. But so few of us do. Hell, we're too busy drinking beer and watching the Minutemen lose to live our own lives.

Children's Day

To the editor:

As many of the us travel home for the holiday weekend, I want to inform the student body of another special occurance happening this weekend.

In May of 1996, the Connecticut Legislature passed a bill designating every second Sunday to be Children's Day in the state of Connecticut.

The significance of this day comes at a time in our history where growing up is harder than ever imagined. Children's Day gives kids the opportunity to speak on different issues, and to be heard by their elders. It is a national, active celebration of our future leaders.

As you drive home to see your friends and family, remember that Sunday is a not-to-known special day in which we should honor our kids and let them know we are there for support, guidance, and laughter.

If anyone is interested in this celebration and the organization which promoted it, please e-mail me.

Remember: Children today, leaders tomorrow.

Retort on racism

To the editor:

Jacob Buckley-Fortin's arguments in his letter (Sept. 30) responding to Keith Didion's Sept. 24 Ed-Op column about racism are weak and confused. In my opinion, Mr. Buckley-Fortin completely fails to make a case against Mr. Didion's position.

Mr. Didion does not attack "all forms of ethnic discussion or acknowledgement as racism." The column specifically attacks that form of ethnic acknowledgement which substitutes group indentity for individual recognition, or attempts to reward or punish any group simply because of that group's or ethnic identity. Mr. Buckley-Fortin labels this "blatantly American" and "individualistic" (without explaining what is meant by those charges), then states that this Americanism and individualism prove Mr. Didion a racist. I do not follow this line of reasoning.

Mr. Buckley-Fortin claims that separating someone from his or her culture/race/upbringing is a disservice, and denies "a basic psychological idea-child development." To whom or what is this a disservice? Does Mr. Buckley-Fortin believe that people can't be separated from their culture/race/upbringing? How is it, then, that many people come to espouse different values than their parents, or live their lives in ways that are radically different from their cultural/racial peers? Are Mr. Buckley-Fortin's ideas and values completely identical to those of his parents? It is Mr. Buckley-Fortin himself who denies child development with this argument.

"Would Mr. Didion rather we not acknowledge race at all?" Mr. Buckley-Fortin asks. My reading convinces me that this was one of Mr. Didion's major points: that we should not use race as a basis on which to judge people. Mr. Buckley-Fortin goes on to say, "We cannot, no matter how much some people hope, all be the same." Again, this is precisely the point: we are not all the same, and therefore we must all be recognized and acknowledged as individuals, rather than as members of a racial/cultural group.

Mr. Buckley-Fortin's final point is that without ethnic acknowledgement, we'll be left with "a lonely, confused fragmentation of the people." How can refusing to judge people by their skin color lead to loneliness, confusion and fragmentation? Why would it be bad to treat each individual as an individual, separate and unique, rather than as a nameless, faceless (and so undoubtedly confused and lonely) member of an ethnic group? "Fragmentation" indeed: we've achieved a great deal of it using Mr. Buckley-Fortin's methods. Perhaps we should turn to Mr. Didion's prescription: "reason, along with independent judgement, individual achievement, and true self-esteem."

Students have protest options

To the editor:

Students at UMass have "rights and responsibilities" when protesting on campus. A "Picketing Code" alerts students to the proper conduct for demonstrations. These eight points, found in the Undergraduate Rights and Responsibilities handbook, inform students of proper protest behavior.

Apparently, demonstrations must meet with University approval, or student activists face potential expulsion. Will this code inhibit student actions on campus, such as those which occurred last spring? It is obvious that the authors of the Picketing Code are hoping for that very result.

The result of the Picketing Code should not be a loss of activism on campus, however. Even if students feel threatened by these weighty "responsibilities," dedication and determination should not suffer. Students who do not want their protests subject to the University guidelines do have options. Those who feel that objecting to University policies is essential must find other avenues. The goals of this University should include fostering growth and independent thought among its students. Therefore, students must find some outlet to express their beliefs. This includes instances when these beliefs run counter to those presented by the University.

Students who wish to present their opinions and attitudes to the entire body now need alternatives to demonstrations. Students who feel uncomfortable or even threatened by the Picketing Code are looking for guidance on this topic. One arena for discussion is the upcoming visit to campus by Governor Michael Dukakis. The visit will be highlighted by a talk on young adults and liberalism. Governor Dukakis will be discussing ideas for student involvement and activism. This enlightening dialogue will present students with new ideas and opportunities. Furthermore, it will provide students with inspiration to raise their hands and voices. The student body as a whole, as well as activists seeking new venues, will profit from this visit. The talk presented by the University Democrats, featuring Governor Michael Dukakis, is at 7:30 p.m. October 15, in Herter Hall. This opportunity should not be missed!

Playing at Hampshire Six Theater

From the very first moment of Kiss The Girls, the director is assuming that what we are watching is the most shocking thing we have ever seen. Gary Fleder (Things To Do In Denver When Your Dead) knows quite well that our attentions will not be captivated merely by a contrived script, so he brilliantly tunes his camera to record not only the action itself, but allows us to indulge in the clever essence of a suspense thriller.

Inspired by the works of Hitchcock — and even at times Ingmar Bergmann — Fleder demands a reaction from every generic sequence and toys with our conceptions of fear with disruptive camera work and countless shots each lasting under five seconds.

However, this is not a new or even provocative phenomena, bur rather his exquisite sense of timing saves a rather uninteresting plot from the sewers of conventional cinema. Even though what we are watching is not the most shocking thing we have ever seen, Kiss The Girls still maintains the security of a high position within the realm of lesser suspense thrillers.

Morgan Freeman is brilliant in a role reminiscent of his character in 1995's Seven, one of the better examples of post-Hitchcock suspense. Despite this blatant example of unjust typecasting, Freeman can still hold his own despite the unfortunate circumstance of having little to work with. His character, Dr. Alex Cross, is a forensic detective for the Washington, D.C. Police Department who travels to North Carolina to help catch a multiple kidnapper and murderer who has abducted his niece. We are informed of very little about Cross's life and who he is aside from being a cop, yet Freeman is a tremendously talented actor and the constant look of sadness in his eyes transcends many unspoken aspects of his personality.

Ashley Judd, on the other hand, plays her role adequately; she is far from having the dynamics that Freeman contains in his abilities, yet there is really nothing wrong with her performance either. She is Kate Mcteirnan, a doctor at the local hospital in Durham, NC near where the kidnapping of several young, attractive college women have occurred. Unaware that she is being stocked, Mcteirnan is eventually kidnapped by the killer in her own home, in another predicable but well photographed scene by Fleder. Here we see a small glimpse of the killer's motives, as he locks Mcteirnan in a cell adjacent to the other cells where each of the women are being held. The killer, who calls himself Casanova, is the ultimate cliche of what the writer assumes will frighten us. He wears a goofy white mask and speaks to his victims like a Don Juan, explaining to them that he loves them dearly and that soon they will love him as well.

When Mcteirnan is able to escape from her abductor she then forces her way into Crost's investigation, hoping to help all the women she left behind. At this point little is left for both actors to work with. Their characters become incidental secondary aspects for the rest of the plot, taking a back seat to the actions of the killer and the possibility that he may not be working alone. Freeman and Judd are left behind as Fleder allows his camera to overcome the restrictions of his limited storyline. As a result, Kiss the Girls is escalated into a far better film than it should have been originally.

There have been so many better examples of genuinely disturbing suspense films that Kiss the Girls cannot be as unnerving as Fleder must have intended. Even recently, a film such as Seven was so successful at tapping into our own personal fears regarding morality and society that it has become a landmark example for its genre. Comparably, Kiss the Girls can't begin to compete, as it lacks Seven's sophistication to justify our bleak and miserable world. By the time of Kiss the Girls' shocking conclusion we refrain from being to shocked, because we have seen things so far superior. At least Freeman can't complain, he was after all the star of Seven anyway. C+

Grateful Dead lyricist returns

Robert Hunter makes rare local stop at NoHo's Academy

COURTESY ROBERT MINKIN

After a long absence from the road, former Grateful Dead lyricist Robert Hunter comes to Northampton to play the Academy of Music this Sunday.

By Joshua Boyd
Collegian Staff

"Inspiration / Move me brightly / Light the song with sense and color / hold away despair." Let's guess who wrote these three lines of epic poetry? Whitman? Our own Miss Emily Dickinson? None of the above. I'll give you the rest of the amazing stanza: "More than this I will not ask / Faced with mysteries dark and vast / Statements just seem vain at last / Some rise, some fall, some climb / to get to Terrapin." These are surprisingly (to those not in the know) lyrics to a rock song sung by the Grateful Dead and written by their former lyricist Robert Hunter. Hunter puts on a solo acoustic show mixing music he wrote for both himself personally and the Dead on Sunday night at the Academy of Music in Northampton.

Hunter grew up near San Francisco, and in the early 1960s made friends with his songwriting partner for the next 30- plus years, Jerry Garcia. The two played in some early "jug" bands (which mixed blues and bluegrass, mostly) with Garcia on his original main instrument, the banjo and Hunter on guitar. It was around 1967 that Hunter was commissioned by the Dead for lyrics, and they started using his name in the band lineup on their records on 1970's American Beauty.

Throughout his career, Hunter's lyrics have employed folk allusions ("Casey Jones"), surrealism ("Dark Star"), and, most famously, the concept of aging ("Touch Of Grey") as well as many other concepts and styles of poetry.

He keeps some of his songs, such as "Arizona Lightning," "Tiger Rose" and "Rum Runners" completely separate from the Dead, as well as his life. His voice and guitar never appeared on a Dead album, nor did he ever step up on stage with the highest-grossing tour band in rock history. Hunter is a man who's always preferred a quieter and more private life, allowing more freedom from press and the general public.

Besides music, Hunter has also delved into the literary field, having translated the poetry of Rainer Maria Rilke and maintains a lively web presence (www.dead.net/RobertHunterArchive/hunterarchive.html).

Sunday night's show will be a chance for the fans who have not seen Hunter yet, but are familiar with the Dead, to see the man who recently described himself as "the Wizard Of Oz behind the curtain pulling all those levers."

Robert Hunter will be playing this Sunday evening at the Academy Of Music in Northampton. Showtime is at 8 p.m. Call the Northampton Box Office at 586-8686 for more information.

Long trip for the A–10 title

Minutewomen take to road to face GW and Va. Tech in pivotal games

By Jorma Kansanen
Collegian Staff

Picture it, if you will...

Three straight weekends on the road capped off with a plane trip to nowhere so you can take a one-hour bus trip to the middle of nowhere, play a match, maybe rest and heal up, then take a five-hour bus trip to your next match, and get back on the plane right afterwards to come back home.

Balance your studies in there, and you may feel at one with the No. 15 Massachusetts women's soccer team. The Minutewomen (9–2, 5–0 in the Atlantic 10) will end their six-game road trip with a match against Virginia Tech in Blacksburg, Va., today (4 p.m.) and George Washington in the nation's capital on Sunday (1 p.m.).

After the last two home matches of the season next weekend against the University of Dayton, assistant coach and former Minutewoman Rebecca Myers — who holds the all-time points scored mark at UMass — and Senior Day celebrations against Xavier University, the Minutewomen will hit the road again for the remainder of the season.

Contests at Fordham and La Salle wrap up the A–10 regular season, and the University of Georgia Tournament in Athens, Ga. this upcoming Halloween weekend will lead UMass into the A–10 postseason tournament held at Xavier in Cincinnati, Ohio.

Sounds tiring, huh? Ask UMass coach Jim Rudy about it and he might wax Cramer-esque on you — and that's not the Kramer from Seinfeld.

"I just remember the saying of the old FIFA coach Detmar Cramer, a coach who inspired me a lot," Rudy said. "He was a great coach in Germany, coaching Franz Beckenbauer at Bayern Munich [in the Bundesliga] in the early '70s, and he used to say, 'After match — before match.'

"That's our story, and after this road trip — another road trip, and I hope the people at home miss us as much as we miss the people at home. It'll be great to get back home to two solid home crowds next weekend. We'll be more than happy to see our group of people."

Virginia Tech is coming into today's contest with a 5–5 record (0–3 in A–10), but the Hokies are undefeated at home with a 4–0 mark. Four out of their five losses are only by one goal, but their offense has been unenigmatic at best.

Matter of fact, the seven Minutewomen holding the top five spots in team scoring would be the top scorer for Va. Tech: Shannon Otto at seven points on three goals and one assist.

"[Hokies coach] Sam Okpodu has his team playing very nicely, and all of their losses are only by one goal," Rudy said. "They've played everybody close, the team is really knocking the ball around and they're undefeated at home."

Women's Soccer
Massachusetts @ Virginia Tech
Today, 4 p.m.

However, the match of the weekend will be against GW (6–3–2, 3–0 in A–10), with the battles between the two sides encapsulating the short history of the conference.

The last meeting between the two teams was in the A–10 conference semi-finals last season, with UMass getting the 1–0 win on sophomore forward Emma Kurowski's goal at the 51:43 mark of the match. Just for a point of reference on this rivalry, ex-assistant coach Chris Chamides' thoughts on that match was it could "officially be called a war."

This season, the Colonials do not have the services of 1996 A–10 Player of the Year Tanya Vogel, but have continued their steady climb towards national respectability. GW has faced five nationally ranked opponents this season, with a tight 2–2 overtime tie with then–No. 11 Maryland as their high point of those contests.

Senior Chemar Smith leads the Colonials in scoring with 19 points on eight goals and three assists, with freshman Lauren Papalia stepping right into the GW lineup with 12 points on five goals and two assists.

"Even though we lost to Dayton last year [in the A–10 final], GW has always been our toughest opponent," Rudy said. "Their schedule is tougher than ours by far, and the difference this year is they have more than one goal scorer.

"No matter what happens, its always a war between UMass and GW, and we're expecting that."

ishing any progress at the net by either team.

"We've started to block the ball better and practices have been competitive," Kenny said. "The team has been working really hard and I think they've made the most of their time to maximize their improvement."

Senior middle blocker Michelle Paciorek will look to grab her third all-time UMass record this weekend. She needs just one block assist to tie Dionne Nash's school-record of 263.

Sophomore outside hitter Kari Hogancamp added 10 kills and 21 digs in the win over Harvard. The nation's leader in digs has now eclipsed the 20-dig plateau four times this year.

The Minutewomen will also look to sophomore middle blocker Jill Meyers who is coming off an 18 kill, 11 dig and six-block performance last Tuesday.

Freshman Rebecca Hasson has been a pleasant surprise for the Minutewomen as she has overcome injury and managed to begin making key contributions.

"We have to keep hitting like we have in practice and keep the ball in play. That's usually key for us," Hasson said.

■ field hockey game, knocking them out of the tournament.

In contrast, the 1996 UMass club fell short to the Orangewomen in a close 1–0 home loss on Columbus Day.

Entering what could likely be the Minutewomen's most pivotal stretch of the season away from home, Shea feels this weekend will offer a true test of her team's character.

"It's always tough to play on another team's home field, especially when they play on turf. Both Syracuse and Ball State are well-coached and will certainly be two tough games for us."

As far as the spirits of her team are concerned, Shea believes that the Minutewomen remain confident entering competition against two nationally ranked opponents.

"We played poorly in North Carolina, and these two games could really turn things around for us," Shea said. "Our group goes into every game thinking they're going to win. They are at their best when they are poised, relaxed, and confident."

UMass hopes to raise their record back above .500 with two victories this weekend, as they prepare for a four-game home stretch that begins Oct. 15 against Providence College.

■ football

opposing defenses. Averaging 104 yards on the ground, and 310 yards in the air, Villanova has outscored their opponents, 182–56.

"They get off the bus ready to throw the ball — they have no bones about it," UMass coach Mike Hodges said. "They want to throw. You can't try to stop one receiver, quarterback or running back. Those guys have too many weapons."

Sophomore quarterback Chris Boden leads this No. 1 rated A–10 attack with 1,113 yards and 14 touchdown passes.

"I don't think you're going to stop him," said Hodges of the Wildcats' signal caller.

"He's an outstanding football player," he said. "We're going to have to play great on the defensive side of the ball to stay in this game."

Boden has a pair of top-notch targets in seniors Brian Finneran and Josh Dolbin. The two have combined for 45 receptions for 830 yards and 12 touchdowns.

Fortunately for the Minutemen, their defense has carried the load all season long.

Junior tri-captain Khari Samuel is enjoying another stellar season in the middle of the Minutemen defense. Since the All-America candidate made the move to inside linebacker this season, he has blossomed into one of the fiercest presences in the A–10.

With 64 tackles this year, Samuel trails only teammate Bryan Mooney (69) atop the A–10 standings in stops.

Sophomore Chris Price has dazzled this year in his starting role at outside linebacker. As a redshirt freshman last season, Price made only 12 stops. But the Boxboro–native has come into his own this season, recording 63 total tackles and a forced fumble.

The Wildcats hold an 8–6 edge in the all–time series with Massachusetts. And UMass hasn't beaten the Wildcats at Villanova Stadium since 1962. The Minutemen were thrashed last year in Villanova, 50–14.

Horoscopes

LIBRA (Sept. 23–Oct. 22) — You must be patient today, and willing to let things develop according to a schedule that is natural and organic. Do not force things!

SCORPIO (Oct. 23–Nov. 21) — Someone you know well may surprise you today with behavior that seems entirely out of character. You can learn a valuable lesson by observing.

SAGITTARIUS (Nov. 22–Dec. 21) — You are likely to approach everything today from a much more involved and passionate point of view. Some others may be surprised.

CAPRICORN (Dec. 22–Jan. 19) — You are in need of a little intellectual challenge today. Things may have been emotional lately, and you need some mental stimuli.

AQUARIUS (Jan. 20–Feb. 18) — Focus on home affairs today; that is where you will receive the most valuable and lasting inspiration. Harmony is worth working for today.

PISCES (Feb. 19–March 20) — You may be flighty and inconsistent today, but there is nothing wrong with that for the time being. Explore new options when you can.

ARIES (March 21–April 19) — You may find yourself involved in a conflict that is not of your making today. Take care that you're not mistaken for an instigator.

TAURUS (April 20–May 20) — Concentrate on home affairs today, and you'll be able to calm yourself and center more completely than you have in the recent past.

GEMINI (May 21–June 20) — Your pride may be standing in the way at this time. Let go of preconceived notions, and let someone else call the shots for a while.

CANCER (June 21–July 22) — You may be asked by someone in charge to tone it down today. This can be done without sacrificing anything of value; be cooperative.

LEO (July 23–Aug. 22) — Do not be contrary today. Do what is asked of you when it is asked, and the rewards you receive in the end may surprise you.

VIRGO (Aug. 23–Sept. 22) — You can be a little more relaxed in your thinking today. Do not try to make everyone conform to your limited notions. Explore new ideas.

Southwest mourns the Yanks' death

COURTESY UNC SPORTS MEDIA
Dean Smith

So, the Patriots lost.

But honestly, it took only a flick of the remote control to ease the sting. Yes, that's right. The Yankees are out. What a welcome relief it was to see George Steinbrenner in his luxury box Monday night, not feeling so luxurious.

The wallet's starting to feel a little light there, huh buddy?

It was a difficult week living in Southwest and having to listen to the Yankee trash fans screaming out their windows at all hours of the night like caged animals.

Corey Peter Goodman goes
Around The Horn

When Bernie Williams flied out to end the series, I opened my window and could hear a pin drop. How beautiful.

The Yankees losing is just further evidence that there is a God... and he's a Sox fan.

• The Patriots' loss to the Broncos now seems to have further implications than originally thought. Bill Parcells and his Jets took care of business Sunday against the hapless, winless Colts. Now, the Patriots have a must–win date against the Bills Sunday in Foxboro while the Jets host the Dolphins.

Don't get me wrong, the Patriots are much more talented than the Jim Kelly–less Bills, but the AFC East throne may be on the line.

• Tampa Bay lost. Thank the Good Lord. This campus is full of kids who root for the Jets, Pats and Giants. And then the rest say they like football, but don't watch a specific team on Sunday. These are the guys that show up to class in their shiny new Tampa Bay hats, and then trash on your team. The team you've pulled for through the 2–14 seasons. You know who you are, Dave Ybarra.

Speaking of which, is Jim Harbaugh dead yet? And what has happened to the Colts and that 0–5 record. I thought Marshall Faulk was "the real deal," Al McGuire? Looks like he's just an average back on arguably the worst team in the NFL. Not so fast, Atlanta, I didn't forget about you guys.

This leads into another argument I have been having with some of our friends from further down the Atlantic coast, in Philadelphia.

Colin Barber is a friend of mine and an Eagles fan, and I respect him for that. After all, he still pulls for them even though they lost to the Giants, and the Vikings (a mediocre team despite their 4–2 record) and after that Monday night Tommy Hutton tragedy. Even I was a little teary–eyed.

But he still claims that the Eagles disastrous 2–3 record is far more impressive than the Patriots 4–1 mark because of a talent imbalance between conferences. His nickname for the AFC is the "minor league."

Here is how I see it. There are three winless teams in football — two in the NFC. One undefeated team — the Broncos, who play in the AFC.

There is no giant in the NFC. Green Bay (4–2) is very beatable. With Edgar Bennet out of the lineup for a long time, the Pack lacks a strong running game. Sorry Dorsey Levens, I'm not impressed.

Then there's Dallas and Troy Aikman who is hardly recognizable with all the shots he's taken this year. Emmitt Smith, please stay healthy long enough to score a touchdown. So sad.

San Francisco is 4–1. But without Jerry Rice, don't start making reservations for San Diego.

Then there's Washington at 3–2. Stay tuned, they'll fold.

That leaves us with Tampa Bay. Yes, they are very good. Scary defense. Warrick Dunn looks unstoppable. But if you're waiting around for the Bucs to carry the torch and lead the NFC to another Super Bowl win, you're pretty sad.

Meanwhile, the Patriots — although embarrassed on Monday Night — are real contenders with experience. Wait until Willie McGinest gets back. You'll be sorry.

No one can beat Denver so far...

Jacksonville (4–1) has emerged as one of the top offenses in the NFL. And now that Mark Brunell is back and healthy, good luck.

Pittsburgh (3–2) can beat anyone on a given day, except Dallas on opening day. Kordell Stewart is cocky, but tough to contain.

And to anyone who still is not convinced about the strength of the AFC this year, I have two words for you:

Tony Banks. The Rams QB is plain horrible and he'll be lucky if he's working at Citgo next fall. Sorry Chris Chandler, Tony just edged you out. No hard feelings.

Basketball legend Dean Smith calls it quits

By David Droshack
Associated Press

CHAPEL HILL, N.C. — Dean Smith retired yesterday as North Carolina's basketball coach after 36 years, two national championships, more victories than anyone else — and just nine days before the start of practice.

"I enjoy basketball. I enjoy coaching basketball," Smith said. "It's the out-of-season stuff I didn't handle well.

"I've been saying for the last eight years or so maybe it's time to go do something else."

And yesterday he shocked basketball fans everywhere by deciding to do exactly that.

Bill Guthridge, Smith's longtime assistant, will succeed him.

"He has learned well from the master and he is ready and eager to do the job," Athletic Director Dick Baddour said.

Guthridge said Smith had had enough of public appearances, autograph signing and speeches.

"It's all the little things that wore Dean out," he said.

Said Smith: "I had one weekend from last Oct. 15 to May 18. I cancelled something. I took a weekend with my family. That's when children and grandchildren are free."

The 66-year old Smith fought back tears and sipped from a cup of water as he announced his retirement at a packed news conference in the basketball arena that bears his name — the Dean Dome.

"I'm the luckiest guy in the world... to be at the University of North Carolina," said Smith, who just last season broke Adolph Rupp's career victory mark of 876.

Among those attending the news conference were current players, Georgetown coach John Thompson, who coached the U.S. Olympic team with Smith in 1976, and Philadelphia 76ers coach Larry Brown, who played for the Tar Heels.

UNC looms as a potential opponent for UMass this season. Both teams play in the Great Alaska Shootout In November.

Minutemen will have new man under center Saturday as Jeff Smith has been benched in favor of senior No. 2 QB Anthony Catterton

It's no secret that the Massachusetts football team has struggled this year.

After opening the season with two mediocre performances against Richmond and Maine, UMass lost a heartbreaker in Virginia to James Madison, squeaked out a win over Rhode Island before getting pummelled last week by New Hampshire, 28–10.

At 1–4, it appears things couldn't get much worse for the Minutemen.

Think again.

This weekend, UMass travels to a hostile Villanova Stadium on the campus of Villanova University in Villanova, Pa. where they hope to avoid getting pounced by the hungry, undefeated No. 4 Wildcats.

On top of everything else, the Minutemen are in the midst of a quarterback controversy. Senior Anthony Catterton will get the nod Saturday in Villanova.

The Orlando native will be making the start under center for the first time since the fourth game of last season. Catterton, an option–type quarterback who has never completed more than nine passes in a single game, ran for 41 yards on 10 carries in his last start — a 21–14 win over Northeastern.

In his career, Catterton has accounted for seven passing touchdowns while rushing for five more.

Catterton replaced sophomore Jeff Smith last week after a slow start against New Hampshire. Smith was just 4–of–14 passing for 34 yards, while Catterton threw for 49 yards and a touchdown on 5–of–14 passing.

Smith has been a disappointment all season, and the offense has struggled to find an identity without a strong leader taking the snaps.

Villanova (4–0) has yet to be challenged this year. After crushing non–conference West Chester in the season opener, 64–0, the Wildcats pulled off the upset of the Atlantic 10 season when they knocked off the then–No. 3 Delaware Blue Hens in Newark, 35–25.

The Wildcats — under head coach Andy Talley — haven't looked back, punishing Maine (34–14) and No. 23 James Madison (49–17) in consecutive weeks.

V–ball takes on A–10 foes at the Cage

The Massachusetts volleyball team returns to conference play this weekend as they take on rival George Washington tonight and Fordham Saturday. Game times are 7 p.m. at the Curry Hicks Cage.

This weekend's Atlantic 10 Conference matches will conclude the Minutewomen's season–long five–match homestand. They are entering tonight's match coming off an impressive win over Ivy League Champion Harvard.

"It's always nice to play at home, but when you have three matches in the same week, it's a little tough to work on everything," coach Bonnie Kenny said. "We've still been able to improve in key areas, though, and its good to get a win before going into this weekend's matches."

UMass enters tonight's match with a 9–7 overall record, 4– 2 in the A–10. George Washington also comes in with a 4–2 conference record and is 13–5 overall.

GW is led by sophomore outside hitter Theresa Ridder who leads the team in kills and hitting percentage. The Colonials have UMass' number in the all–time series, but the Minutewomen split their two matches versus GW last year. Their last match was a 3–1 loss to conference foe Duquesne, a team UMass beat 3–1 earlier in the season.

"George Washington is big and will do some creative things at the net to try and distract us," Kenny said.

The Minutewomen have been perfect versus Fordham, winning all four matches against the Lady Rams which includes a sweep of their two matches last year, 3–1 and 3–0.

"Fordham is the most improved team in the conference," Kenny said. "They're big, physical, aggressive and definitely have threats at the net."

UMass will look to freshman setter Jennifer Drennan to keep the ball in play for the Minutewomen so they can take advantage of their excellent ball control while diminishing the effectiveness of the opposing team's offense.

Minutemen finish off homestand

Atlantic 10 foes, Colonials and Hokies come to Totman for pair this weekend

By Michael Kobylanski

Has the Massachusetts men's soccer team been presented with this scenario before?

A big weekend with two conference home games where a pair of wins would undoubtedly go a long way towards winning the Atlantic 10 crown.

Yes, they have. It's just a carbon copy of last weekend.

The Minutemen will take to Totman Field twice this weekend to host Virginia Tech today at 3:30 p.m. and George Washington Sunday at 1 p.m.

After squeaking out a 2–0 win over Rhode Island on Wednesday, coach Sam Koch is looking for his team to get back on track this weekend.

"We have to try to get our style of play back," Koch said. "We can't worry about the other teams, we have to worry about ourselves."

Nevertheless, the Minutemen (8–2–1, 4–1 A–10) are on a roll as of late. They have won four games in a row, all of which were against conference opponents. This streak should help UMass this weekend in its quest to finish its recent homestand at 5–0.

"We're definitely gaining momentum. Things are rolling right now," senior forward Mike Butler said. "We have two big matches this weekend. Our goal was to finish this homestand at 5–0, and we're already more than halfway there."

Butler will be one of the players looked upon to help jump start the Minutemen. He scored both goals in the win over Rhode Island, and is the team leader in goals and points.

Minutewomen with an attitude

According to Massachusetts field hockey coach Patty Shea, "scoring is an art, but it's more of an attitude."

And, although in the midst of a three–game losing streak, Shea still believes that her squad possesses the "attitude" necessary for a solid performance this weekend, when the Minutewomen (5–7–0) travel to Syracuse, N.Y. for a two– game showdown with No. 9 Ball State and host Syracuse, who is currently sitting at No. 10 in the polls.

Despite the losing streak, Shea remains confident that her team will enter this weekend's competition on a high note, after witnessing their impressive effort in a 3–0 loss to Boston University on Wednesday.

"It's a real struggle when nothing goes in," Shea said. "But there's a lot we can build on. We controlled the center of the field, and I think it's just a matter of us needing to finish the play."

Impressing coach Shea even more was her team's resolve at BU, giving a strong showing after a pair of losses to national power North Carolina and Wake Forest.

"We have a lot to build on [for this weekend]," the first– year UMass coach said. "I'm proud of their performance because after their drubbing last weekend, they could have easily folded."

Neither of the next two UMass opponents are unfamiliar to the Minutewomen players. Ball State has a score to settle with the UMass squad, because the Minutewomen topped the Cardinals 2–1 last season in an NCAA Play–In

Mex. army controls shelters during storm

By Mark Stevenson
Associated Press

ACAPULCO, Mexico — To prevent food and other aid from being hoarded or stolen, the Mexican army yesterday took over the emergency shelters for thousands of Acapulco residents displaced by Hurricane Pauline.

Soldiers took charge of tons of donated goods at 67 shelters housing nearly 2,800 people in Acapulco, which was battered by Pauline on Thursday. Troops also erected tents and camp kitchens for the homeless.

Some storm victims complained Monday that supplies had disappeared from relief stations and that some volunteers were hoarding or selling goods, said Felix Gonzalez, a city official.Dozens of others marched on the mayor's office to complain that their shelters had no food.

Octavio Garcia, a 38–year–old construction worker, said a neighborhood leader was selling food and clothes put in his care. "The ones who need it haven't gotten anything. They're taking advantage of people," he said.

Clinton video tape requested by Reno

By Sonya Ross
Associated Press

BRASILIA, Brazil — President Clinton, reacting yesterday to a comment by Attorney General Janet Reno, did not rule out submitting to questioning by the Justice Department in its fund-raising investigation.

Asked by reporters whether he was willing to undergo such questioning, he said, "I will do anything that is necessary to get her and the Justice Department the information they need." Reno had said a day earlier, "We're going to pursue every lead and interview anyone who has information concerning the transactions involved in this whole investigation."

Asked if that could include Clinton, she said, "Exactly." Clinton, who spoke to reporters aboard Air Force One on his South American trip, described himself as even angrier than Reno when he learned of delays in providing videotapes of White House coffees to investigators.
